PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Fellow-citizens of the Senate and House of Representatives:

I have the satisfaction, on our present meeting, of being able to communicate to you the successful termination of the war which had been commenced against the United States by the Regency of Algiers. The squadron in advance on that service, under Commodore Decatur, lost not a moment after its arrival in the Mediterranean, in seeking the naval force of the enemy then cruising in that sea, and succeeded in capturing two of his ships, one of them the principal ship, commanded by the Algerine Admiral. The high character of the American commander was brilliantly sustained on the occasion, which brought his own ship into close action with that of his adversary, as was the accustomed gallantry of all the officers and men actually engaged. Having prepared the way by this demonstration of American skill and prowess, he hastened to the port of Algiers, where peace was promptly yielded to his victorious force. In the terms stipulated, the rights and honor of the United States were particularly consulted, by a perpetual relinquishment, on the part of the Dey, of all pretensions to tribute from them. The impressions which have thus been made, strengthened as they will have been, by subsequent transactions with the Regencies of Tunis and of Tripoli, by the appearance of the larger force which followed under Commodore Bainbridge, the chief in command of the expedition, and by the judicious precautionary arrangements left by him in that quarter, afford a reasonable prospect of future security, for the valuable portion of our commerce which passes within reach of the Barbary cruisers.

It is another source of satisfaction that the Treaty of Peace with Great Britain has been succeeded by a Convention on the subject of commerce, concluded by the Plenipotentiaries of the two countries. In this result a disposition is manifested on the part of that nation, corresponding with the disposition of the United States, which, it may be hoped, will be improved into liberal arrangements on other subjects, on which the parties have mutual interests, or which might endanger their future harmony. Congress will decide on the expediency of promoting such a sequel, by giving effect to the measure of confining the American navigation to American seamen; a measure which, at the same time that it might have that conciliatory tendency, would have the further advantage of increasing the independence of our navigation, and the resources for our maritime defence.

In conformity with the articles in the Treaty of Ghent, relating to the Indians, as well as with a view to the tranquillity of our Western and Northern frontiers, measures were taken to establish an immediate peace with the several tribes who had been engaged in hostilities against the United States. Such of them as were invited to Detroit acceded readily to a renewal of the former treaties of friendship. Of the other tribes who were invited to a station on the Mississippi, the greatest number have also accepted the peace offered to them. The residue, consisting of the more distant tribes, or parts of tribes, remain to be brought over by further explanations, or by such other means as may be adapted to the dispositions they may finally disclose.

The Indian tribes within, and bordering on the Southern frontier, whom a cruel war on their part had compelled us to chastise into peace, have latterly shown a restlessness, which has called for preparatory measures for repressing it, and for protecting the Commissioners engaged in carrying the terms of peace into execution.

The execution of the act for fixing the Military Peace Establishment, has been attended with difficulties which even now can only be overcome by Legislative aid. The selection of officers; the payment and discharge of the troops enlisted for the war; the payment of the retained troops, and their re-union from detached and distant stations; the collection and security of the public property in the Quartermaster, Commissary, and Ordnance Departments; and the constant medical assistance required in hospitals and garrisons, rendered a complete execution of the act impracticable on the first of May, the period more immediately contemplated. As soon, however, as circumstances would permit, and as far as it has been practicable, consistently with the public interests, the reduction of the Army has been accomplished; but the appropriations for its pay and for other branches of the military service, having proved inadequate, the earliest attention to that subject will be necessary; and the expediency of continuing, upon the Peace Establishment, the staff officers who have hitherto been provisionally retained, is also recommended to the consideration of Congress.

In the performance of the Executive duty upon this occasion, there has not been wanting a just sensibility to the merits of the American Army during the late war; but the obvious policy and design in fixing an efficient Military Peace Establishment did not afford an opportunity to distinguish the aged and infirm, on account of their past services; nor the wounded and disabled, on account of their present sufferings. The extent of the reduction, indeed, unavoidably involved the exclusion of many meritorious officers of every rank from the service of their country; and so equal, as well as so numerous, were the claims to attention, that a decision by the standard of comparative merit could seldom be attained. Judged, however, in candor, by a general standard of positive merit, the Army register will, it is believed, do honor to the establishment; while the case of those officers, whose names are not included in it, devolves, with the strongest interest, upon the Legislative authority, for such provision as shall be deemed the best calculated to give support and solace to the veteran and the invalid; to display the beneficence, as well as the justice, of the Government; and to inspire a martial zeal for the public service upon every future emergency.

Although the embarrassments arising from the want of a uniform National currency have not been diminished since the adjournment of Congress, great satisfaction has been derived in contemplating the revival of the public credit, and the efficiency of the public resources. The receipts into the Treasury, from the various branches of revenue, during the nine months ending on the 30th of September last, have been estimated at twelve millions and a half of dollars; the issues of Treasury notes of every denomination, during the same period, amounted to the sum of fourteen millions of dollars; and there was also obtained upon loan, during the same period, a sum of nine millions of dollars; of which the sum of six millions of dollars was subscribed in cash, and the sum of three millions of dollars in Treasury notes. With these means, added to the sum of one million and a half of dollars, being the balance of money in the Treasury on the first of January, there has been paid, between the first of January and the first of October, on account of the appropriations of the preceding and of the present year, (exclusively of the amount of the Treasury notes subscribed to the loan, and of the amount redeemed in the payment of duties and taxes,) the aggregate sum of thirty-three millions and a half of dollars, leaving a balance then in the Treasury estimated at the sum of three millions of dollars. Independent, however, of the arrearages due for military services and supplies, it is presumed that a further sum of five millions of dollars, including the interest on the public debt payable on the first of January next, will be demanded at the Treasury to complete the expenditures of the present year, and for which the existing ways and means will sufficiently provide.

The National debt, as it was ascertained on the first of October last, amounted in the whole to the sum of one hundred and twenty millions of dollars, consisting of the unredeemed balance of the debt contracted before the late war, (thirty-nine millions of dollars,) the amount of the funded debt contracted in consequence of the war, (sixty-four millions of dollars,) and the amount of the unfunded and floating debt, (including the various issues of Treasury notes,) seventeen millions of dollars, which is in a gradual course of payment. There will, probably, be some addition to the public debt, upon the liquidation of various claims, which are depending; and a conciliatory disposition on the part of Congress may lead honorably and advantageously to an equitable arrangement of the militia expenses incurred by the several States, without the previous sanction or authority of the Government of the United States; but when it is considered that the new, as well as the old portion of the debt has been contracted in the assertion of the national rights and independence; and when it is recollected that the public expenditures, not being exclusively bestowed upon subjects of a transient nature, will long be visible in the number and equipments of the American navy, in the military works for the defence of our harbors and our frontiers, and in the supplies of our arsenals and magazines, the amount will bear a gratifying comparison with the objects which have been attained, as well as with the resources of the country.

The arrangements of the finances, with a view to the receipts and expenditures of a permanent Peace Establishment, will necessarily enter into the deliberations of Congress during the present session. It is true that the improved condition of the public revenue will not afford the means of maintaining the faith of the Government with its creditors inviolate, and of prosecuting, successfully, the measures of the most liberal policy, but will also justify an immediate alleviation of the burdens imposed by the necessities of the war. It is, however, essential to every modification of the finances, that the benefits of a uniform National currency should be restored to the community. The absence of the precious metals will, it is believed, be a temporary evil; but, until they can again be rendered the general medium of exchange, it devolves on the wisdom of Congress to provide a substitute, which shall equally engage the confidence, and accommodate the wants of the citizens throughout the Union. If the operation of the State banks cannot produce this result, the probable operation of a National Bank will merit consideration; and if neither of these expedients be deemed effectual, it may become necessary to ascertain the terms upon which the notes of the Government (no longer required as an instrument of credit) shall be issued, upon motives of general policy, as a common medium of circulation.

Notwithstanding the security for future repose, which the United States ought to find in their love of peace, and their constant respect for the rights of other nations, the character of the times particularly inculcates the lesson, that, whether to prevent or repel danger, we ought not to be unprepared for it. This consideration will sufficiently recommend to Congress a liberal provision for the immediate extension and gradual completion of the works of defence, both fixed and floating, on our maritime frontier, and an adequate provision for guarding our inland frontier against dangers to which certain portions of it may continue to be exposed.

As an improvement in our Military Establishment, it will deserve the consideration of Congress, whether a corps of invalids might not be so organized and employed, as at once to aid in the support of meritorious individuals, excluded by age or infirmities from the existing establishment, and to procure to the public the benefit of their stationary services, and of their exemplary discipline. I recommend, also, an enlargement of the Military Academy, already established, and the establishment of others in other sections of the Union. And I cannot press too much on the attention of Congress, such a classification and organization of the militia as will most effectually render it the safeguard of a free State. If experience has shown, in the recent splendid achievements of militia, the value of this resource for the public defence, it has shown also the importance of that skill in the use of arms, and that familiarity with the essential rules of discipline, which cannot be expected from the regulations now in force. With this subject is intimately connected the necessity of accommodating the laws, in every respect, to the great object of enabling the political authority of the Union to employ, promptly and effect-ally, the physical power of the Union in the cases designated by the Constitution.

The signal services which have been rendered by our Navy, and the capacities it has developed for successful co-operation in the national defence, will give to that portion of the public force its full value in the eyes of Congress, at an epoch which calls for the constant vigilance of all Governments. To preserve the ships now in a sound state; to complete those already contemplated; to provide amply the imperishable materials for prompt augmentations, and to improve the existing arrangements into more advantageous establishments, for the construction, the repairs, and the security of the vessels of war, is dictated by the soundest policy.

In adjusting the duties on imports, to the object of revenue, the influence of the tariff on manufactures will necessarily present itself for consideration. However wise the theory may be, which leaves to the sagacity and interest of individuals the application of their industry and resources, there are in this, as in other cases, exceptions to the general rule. Besides the condition which the theory itself implies, of a reciprocal adoption by other nations, experience teaches that so many circumstances must concur in introducing and maturing manufacturing establishments, especially of the more complicated kinds, that a country may remain long without them, although sufficiently advanced, and, in some respects, even peculiarly fitted for carrying them on with success. Under circumstances giving a powerful impulse to manufacturing industry, it has made among us a progress, and exhibited an efficiency, which justify the belief that, with a protection not more than is due to the enterprising citizens whose interests are now at stake, it will become, at an early day, not only safe against occasional competitions from abroad, but a source of domestic wealth, and even of external commerce. In selecting the branches more especially entitled to the public patronage, a preference is obviously claimed by such as will relieve the United States from a dependence on foreign supplies, ever subject to casual failures, for articles necessary for the public defence, or connected with the primary wants of individuals. It will be an additional recommendation of particular manufactures, where the materials for them are extensively drawn from our agriculture, and consequently impart and insure to that great fund of national prosperity and independence an encouragement which cannot fail to be rewarded.

Among the means of advancing the public interest, the occasion is a proper one for recalling the attention of Congress to the great importance of establishing throughout our country the roads and canals which can be best executed, under the national authority. No objects within the circle of political economy so richly repay the expense bestowed on them; there are none, the utility of which is more universally ascertained and acknowledged; none that do more honor to the Governments whose wise and enlarged patriotism duly appreciates them. Nor is there any country which presents a field, where nature invites more the art of man, to complete her own work, for his accommodation and benefit. These considerations are strengthened, moreover, by the political effect of these facilities for intercommunication, in bringing and binding more closely together the various parts of our extended confederacy. Whilst the States, individually, with a laudable enterprise and emulation, avail themselves of their local advantages, by new roads, by navigable canals, and by improving the streams susceptible of navigation, the General Government is the more urged to similar undertakings, requiring a national jurisdiction, and national means, by the prospect of thus systematically completing so inestimable a work. And it is a happy reflection, that any defect of Constitutional authority, which may be encountered, can be supplied in a mode which the Constitution itself has providently pointed out.

The present is a favorable season also for bringing again into view the establishment of a National seminary of learning within the District of Columbia, and with means drawn from the property therein subject to the authority of the General Government. Such an institution claims the patronage of Congress, as a monument of their solicitude for the advancement of knowledge, without which the blessings of liberty cannot be fully enjoyed, or long preserved; as a model, instructive in the formation of other seminaries; as a nursery of enlightened preceptors; and, as a central resort of youth and genius from every part of their country, diffusing, on their return, examples of those national feelings, those liberal sentiments, and those congenial manners, which contribute cement to our union and strength to the great political fabric, of which that is the foundation.

In closing this communication, I ought not to repress a sensibility, in which you will unite, to the happy lot of our country, and to the goodness of a superintending Providence, to which we are indebted for it. Whilst other portions of mankind are laboring under the distresses of war, or struggling with adversity in other forms, the United States are in the tranquil enjoyment of prosperous and honorable peace. In reviewing the scenes through which it has been attained, we can rejoice in the proofs given, that our political institutions, founded in human rights, and framed for their preservation, are equal to the severest trials of war, as well as adapted to the ordinary periods of repose. As fruits of this experience, and of the reputation acquired by the American arms, on the land and on the water, the nation finds itself possessed of a growing respect abroad, and of a just confidence in itself, which are among the best pledges for its peaceful career. Under other aspects of our country, the strongest features of its flourishing condition are seen, in a population rapidly increasing, on a territory as productive as it is extensive; in a general industry and fertile ingenuity, which find their ample rewards; and in an affluent revenue, which admits of a reduction of the public burdens, without withdrawing the means of sustaining the public credit, of gradually discharging the public debt, of providing for the necessary defensive and precautionary establishments, and of patronizing, in every authorized mode, undertakings conducive to the aggregate wealth and individual comfort of our citizens.

It remains for the guardians of the public welfare, to persevere in that justice and good will towards other nations, which invite a return of these sentiments towards the United States; to cherish institutions which guarantee their safety and their liberties, civil and religious; and to combine, with a liberal system of foreign commerce, an improvement of the national advantages, and a protection and extension of the independent resources of our highly favored and happy country.

In all measures having such objects, my faithful co-operation will be afforded. JAMES MADISON.

COMPENSATION FOR HORSES LOST.

Mr. TALBOT presented the memorial of the Legislature of the State of Kentucky, praying compensation for horses lost by the citizens of that State, during the late war, while in the service of the United States, as stated in the memorial; which was read, and referred to the Committee, appointed the 11th December, on Military Affairs. The memorial is as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled:

The memorial of the Legislature of the State of Kentucky would respectfully call the attention of Congress to a subject of considerable importance to many of their citizens, who unfortunately lost their horses during the various campaigns carried on from this State, in the late war with the British and their savage allies, particularly on the Northwestern frontier, where the losses sustained were peculiarly severe, owing to many circumstances which we will detail, and which at the time demanded every sacrifice.

The extensive wilderness bordering upon our Northwestern frontier, every part of which was infested by a cruel and savage enemy, made it necessary that large bodies of mounted riflemen should be employed in order to meet the various attacks of an insidious foe, and to comply with which the people of the Western country never hesitated, or inquired what compensation was to be made them. They relied upon the justice of their country, which, they believed, would never be withheld from the soldier who had risked his life in defence of his country's rights.

The Legislature are aware of the provision made by act of Congress for the use and risk of horses lost by mounted men previous to the declaration of war, and they have no doubt there are some cases which have not as great claims upon the Government as others. Yet, when the situation of the State of Kentucky is taken into consideration, it will be found that the claims of her citizens to compensation for horses lost during the war will be found not inferior to any other section of the Union. Placed at a considerable distance from the scene of military operations, the calls for men by the Government were generally made at a time when the greatest despatch and energy were required.

In the Summer of 1812, the surrender of General Hull, the fall of Detroit, Mackinac, and Chicago, and the consequent siege of Forts Wayne and Harrison, called aloud for all the patriotism of the State of Kentucky.

The emergency could only be met by mounted men, who, in a few days, were found filling up the ranks of Generals Harrison and Hopkins; the remaining forts were saved, the frontiers protected, a savage enemy checked in his bloody career, and destruction and retribution carried back into his own country; and the various tribes of hostile Indians, flushed with their recent success, were driven to seek refuge under the cannon of their British friends.

In aid of which important services, the regiment of dragoons under the command of Colonel Simrall, the volunteer company of Captain Smith, and the twelve months' volunteers with Captain Garrard, contributed their full portion of zeal and patriotism at the battle of Mississinewa in the midst of winter, besides many other important services, which lost to them many horses besides those killed in battle. These are cases which richly deserve the notice of a grateful country.

Early in the year 1813 a regiment of mounted riflemen, under the command of Col. Richard M. Johnson, was hurried into service to relieve Fort Meigs and protect the frontiers of the State of Ohio. This regiment was usefully employed, and it is believed fully answered the expectation of their country. Previous to the second investiture of Fort Meigs, they penetrated far into the enemy's country, and by forced marches reached that important post at a critical period, and were employed by the Commanding General to procure intelligence of the enemy's movements near Malden; by which means General Harrison was enabled to carry on his operations in security. These, and subsequent marches of unusual celerity, had a tendency to break down and destroy many of the best horses belonging to that corps.

Again, when it was found, late in the month of July, 1813, that the contemplated force of regular troops could not be collected, the Commanding General of the Northwestern Army was compelled to call upon the Governor of Kentucky for an additional militia force.

The lateness of the season, the necessity of the times, the importance of the service required, as well as the critical period which had arrived, in which the hopes of a desponding country were to be realized or again blasted—all combined to point out to the Executive of this State that mounted men could alone meet the approaching crisis, and render that service so loudly called for by every friend to his country. With these views, it is well known that between three and four thousand mounted men rallied round the standard of their country, which had been erected by the venerable Shelby, many of whom had to travel between two and three hundred miles before they reached the point of rendezvous. With these troops, without delaying a single day unnecessarily, the Governor of Kentucky moved on to the headquarters of the Northwestern army, where his arrival was as critical as it was important, and absolutely necessary to meet the views of General Harrison. Forced marches were required and performed; our citizens did not linger on the road, or suffer their spirits to be depressed; for many, after losing their horses by fatigue, would keep up with the army on foot, to the astonishment as well as pride of their country and fellow-soldiers.

We cannot avoid further stating to your honorable body that, in order to take advantage of Commodore Perry's success upon Lake Erie, and carry the war into the enemy's country, it was necessary to leave the horses of the troops enclosed in the peninsula formed by the Sandusky Bay and Portage river, where they subsisted in the forest upwards of one month, which much reduced them, and consequently produced many serious and unavoidable losses on the homeward march, as a sufficiency of forage could not be procured at that place. An important victory was gained, and the most sanguine anticipations of the Government realized. And will the nation now, on the return of peace, refuse to remunerate our citizens, many of whom are poor, and some of whom have lost their only horse? We trust not, and therefore earnestly solicit the attention of Congress to this subject, which, though of small moment to the nation at large, yet is important to individuals.

We would also include the cases of horses lost during the Fall of 1814, under Major P. Dudley, who served with General McArthur, in Upper Canada, who, we believe, rendered important services to our country in cutting off the supplies of the enemy, and which would have been most severely felt by them in case another campaign had opened in that quarter.

Nor can her citizens have less claim on the justice of their country to remunerate them for lost property, who, during an inclement season, and through a country peopled by savage enemies only, encountered every danger and difficulty in the wagon department, transporting provisions, forage, and camp equipage for the army and garrisons of the Northwest; many of whom were induced to embark in that dangerous employ more from a desire to serve their country than from the prospect of gain. Nor were the services rendered their country by the detachment of Kentucky troops under the command of Colonel William Russell, on the Wabash river, less meritorious, nor the losses sustained by them less just to remunerate.

We therefore most seriously request that the cases of lost horses alluded to in this memorial be attended to, and that our citizens be fully compensated, as far as the justice of their several cases may require; and, for the purpose of bringing this subject before Congress, be it

Resolved by the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, That the Governor of this State be requested to transmit a copy of the foregoing memorial to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress, with a request that they immediately lay the same before that body, and that they use their best influence to have the same complied with as soon as the nature of the case will admit.

Mr. JAMES BARBOUR rose and addressed the Chair as follows: Mr. President, as it seems to be the wish of the Senate to pass upon this subject without debate, it adds to the reluctance I always feel when compelled, even by a sense of duty, to intrude on their attention. Yet, as I feel myself obliged, under the solemn responsibility attached to the station I hold here, to vote against the bill under consideration—as I think, also, it is but a due respect to the other branch of the Legislature, from whom it is my misfortune to differ, and but an act of justice to myself to state the grounds of my opinion, I must be pardoned for departing from the course which seemed to be desired by the Senate.

In the exercise of this privilege, with a view to promote the wishes of the Senate as far as a sense of duty will permit, I will confine myself to a succinct view of the most prominent objections which lie against its passage, rather than indulge in the extensive range of which the subject is susceptible. Before I enter into the discussion of the merits of the question, I beg leave to call the attention of the Senate to the course which was adopted by us in relation to this subject. A bill, brought in by the Committee on Foreign Relations, passed the Senate unanimously, declaring that all laws in opposition to the convention between the United States and Great Britain, concluded on the 3d July last, should be held as null and void. The principle on which this body acted, was, that the treaty, upon the exchange of its ratification, did, of itself, repeal any commercial regulation, incompatible with its provisions, existing in our municipal code; it being by us believed at the time that such a bill was not necessary, but by a declaratory act, it was supposed, all doubts and difficulties, should any exist, might be removed. This bill is sent to the House of Representatives, who, without acting thereon, send us the one under consideration, but differing materially from ours. Far from pretending an intimate knowledge of the course of business pursued by the two Houses, I do not say that the mode adopted in this particular case is irregular, but if it has not the sanction of precedent, it appears to me to be wanting in that courtesy which should be perpetually cherished between the two Houses. It would have been more decorous to have acted on our bill; to have agreed to it if it were approved; to reject or amend it. In the latter case, upon its being returned to the Senate, the views of the other body would have been contrasted with our own, and we might then have regularly passed upon the subject. A different course, however, has been adopted; and if a regard to etiquette had been the only obstacle to my support to the bill, it would have been readily given; for it is the substance, and not the shadow, which weighs with me. The difference between the two bills is rendered important by its involving a Constitutional question.

It is my misfortune, for such I certainly esteem it, to differ from the other branch of the Legislature on that question; were it a difference of opinion on the expediency of a measure, it might readily be obviated, as being entirely free, or at least I hope so, from pride of opinion. My disposition is to meet, by mutual concession, those with whom I am in the habit of acting; but when a principle of the Constitution is involved, concession and compromise are out of the question. With one eye on the sacred charter of our liberties, and the other on the solemn sanction under which I act here, I surrender myself to the dictates of my best judgment, (weak enough God knows,) and fearlessly pursue the course pointed out by these guides. My regret is certainly greatly lessened by the reflection that there is no difference of opinion with any one on the propriety of executing the treaty with good faith—we differ only as to the manner in which our common purpose shall be effected.

The difference between the friends of the bill, and those opposed to it is, as I understand it, this: the former contend, that the law of Congress, discriminating between American and British tonnage, is not abrogated by the treaty, although its provisions conflict with the treaty, but that to effect its repeal, the bill in question, a mere echo of the treaty, must pass; the latter, among whom I wish to be considered, on the contrary say, that the law above alluded to was annulled upon the ratification of the treaty. I hope I have succeeded in stating the question fairly, for that certainly was my wish, and it is also my determination to discuss it in the same spirit.

This, then, is the issue which is made up between the friends and the opponents of the bill; and although in its practical effects I cannot believe it would be of consequence which way it is decided, yet, as the just interpretation of the Constitution is the pivot on which it turns, from that consideration alone the question becomes an interesting one.

Fortunately for us we have a written Constitution to recur to, dictated with the utmost precision of which our language is susceptible—it being the work of whatsoever of wisdom, of experience, and of foresight, united America possessed.

To a just understanding of this instrument, it will be essential to recur to the object of its adoption; in this there can be no difference of opinion. The old band of union had been literally dissolved in its own imbecility; to remedy this serious evil, an increase of the powers of the General Government was indispensable.

To draw the line of demarcation between the powers thus granted to the General Government, and those retained by the States, was the primary and predominating object. In conformity with this view, we find a general enumeration of the powers assigned the former, of which Congress is made the depository; which powers, although granted to Congress in the first instance, are, in the same instrument, subsequently distributed among the other branches of the Government. Various examples might be adduced in support of this position. The following for the present will suffice: Art. 1, sec. 1, of the Constitution declares, that "all legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives." Yet we find, by the seventh section of the same article, the President invested with a large share of legislative power, and, in fact, constituting an integral branch of the Legislature; in addition to this, I will here barely add, that the grant of the very power to regulate the exercise of which gave birth to this bill, furnishes, by the admission of the friends of the bill, another evidence of the truth of this position, as I shall show hereafter; and, therefore, to comprehend the true meaning of the Constitution, an isolated view of a particular clause or section will involve you in error, while a comprehensive one, both of its spirit and letter, will conduct you to a just result; when apparent collisions will be removed, and vigor and effect will be given to every part of the instrument. With this principle as our guide, I come directly to that part of the Constitution which recognises the treaty-making power. In the 2d clause, 2d sec., 2d art., are the following plain and emphatic words: "He (the President) shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur." Two considerations here irresistibly present themselves—first, there is no limitation to the exercise of the power, save such restrictions as arise from the Constitution, as to the subjects on which it is to act; nor is there any participation of the power, with any other branch of the Government, in any way alluded to.

Am I borne out in this declaration by the clause referred to? That I am, seems to me susceptible of demonstration. To the President and Senate has been imparted the power of making treaties. Well, what is a treaty? If a word have a known signification by the common consent of mankind, and it be used without any qualification in a law, constitution, or otherwise, the fair inference is that the received import of such word is intended to be conveyed. If so, the extent of the power intended to be granted admits of no difficulty. It reaches to those acts of courtesy and kindness, which philanthropy has established in the intercourse of nations, as well as to treaties of commerce, of boundaries, and, in fine, to every international subject whatsoever. This exposition is supported by such unequivocal authority, that it is believed it will not be questioned. I, therefore, infer that it will be readily yielded, that in regard to the treaty, in aid of which this bill is exhibited, the treaty-making power has not exceeded its just limits. So far we have proceeded on sure ground; we now come to the pith of the question. Is the legislative sanction necessary to give it effect? I answer in the negative. Why? Because, by the second clause of the sixth article of the Constitution, it is declared that all treaties made or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land. If this clause means anything, it is conclusive of the question.

If the treaty be a supreme law, then whatsoever municipal regulation comes within its provisions must ipso facto be annulled—unless gentlemen contend, there can be at the same time two supreme laws, emanating from the same authority, conflicting with each other, and still both in full vigor and effect. This would indeed produce a state of things without a parallel in human affairs, unless indeed its like might be found in the history of the Popes. In one instance, we are told, there were three at one time roaming over the Christian world, all claiming infallibility, and denouncing their anathemas against all who failed to yield implicit obedience to their respective mandates, when to comply with the one was to disobey the other. A result like this, so monstrous in its aspect, excludes the interpretation which produces it. It is a safe course in attempting to ascertain the meaning of a law or constitution to connect different clauses (no matter how detached) upon the same subject together. Let us do it in this case. The President shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, which treaties shall be the supreme law of the land. I seek to gain no surreptitious advantage from the word supreme, because I frankly admit that it is used in the Constitution, in relation to the laws and constitutions of the States; but I appeal to it merely to ascertain the high authority intended to be imparted by the framers of the Constitution to a ratified treaty. It is classed in point of dignity with the laws of the United States. We ask for no superiority, but equality; and as the last law made annuls a former one, where they conflict, so we contend that a subsequent treaty, as in the present case, revokes a former law in opposition thereto. But the other side contend, that it is inferior to the law in point of authority, which continues in full force despite of a treaty, and to its repeal the assent of the whole Legislature is necessary. Our claims rest on the expressed words of the Constitution—the opposite on implication; and if the latter be just, I cannot forbear to say that the framers of the Constitution would but ill deserve what I have heretofore thought a just tribute to their meritorious services. If they really designed to produce the effect contended for, instead of so declaring by a positive provision, they have used a language which, to my mind, operates conclusively against it. Under what clause of the Constitution is the right to exercise this power set up? The reply is, the 3d clause of 8th section 1st article—Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, &c. I immediately inquire to what extent does the authority of Congress, in relation to commercial treaties, reach? Is the aid of the Legislature necessary in all cases whatsoever, to give effect to a commercial treaty? It is readily admitted that it is not. That a treaty, whose influence is extra-territorial, becomes obligatory the instant of its ratification. That, as the aid of the Legislature is not necessary to its execution, the Legislature have no right to interpose. It is then admitted that while a general power on the subject of commerce is given to Congress, that yet important commercial regulations may be adopted by treaty, without the co-operation of the Legislature, notwithstanding the generality of the grant of power on commercial subjects to Congress. If it be true that the President and Senate have, in their treaty-making power, an exclusive control over part and not over the whole, I demand to know at what point that exclusive control ceases? In the clause relied upon, there is no limitation. The fact is, sir, none exists. The treaty-making power over commerce is supreme. No legislative sanction is necessary, if the treaty be capable of self-execution, and when a legislative sanction is necessary, as I shall more at large hereafter show, such sanction, when given, adds nothing to the validity of the treaty, but enables the proper authority to execute it; and when the Legislature do act in this regard, it is under such obligation as the necessity of fulfilling a moral contract imposes.

If it be inquired of me what I understand by the clause in question, in answer I refer to the principle with which I set out; that this was a grant of power to the General Government of which Congress was in the first instance merely the depository, which power, had not a portion thereof been transferred to another branch of the Government, would have been exclusively exercised by Congress, but that a distribution of this power has been made by the Constitution; as a portion thereof has been given to the treaty-making power, and that which is not transferred is left in the possession of Congress. Hence, to Congress it is competent to act in this grant in its proper character by establishing municipal regulations. The President and the Senate, on the other hand, have the same power within their sphere, that is, by a treaty or convention with a foreign nation, to establish such regulations in regard to commerce, as to them may seem friendly to the public interest. Thus each department moves in its own proper orbit, nor do they come in collision with each other. If they have exercised their respective powers on the same subject, the last act, whether by the Legislature or the treaty-making power, abrogates a former one. The Legislature of the nation may, if a cause exist in their judgment sufficient to justify it, abrogate a treaty, as has been done; so the President and Senate by a treaty may abrogate a pre-existing law containing interfering provisions, as has been done heretofore, (without the right being questioned,) and as we say in the very case under consideration. I will endeavor to make myself understood by examples; Congress has power, under the clause in question, to lay embargoes, to pass non-intercourse or non-importation or countervailing laws, and this power they have frequently exercised. On the other hand, if the nation against whom one of those laws is intended to operate, is made sensible of her injustice and tenders reparation, the President and Senate have power by treaty to restore the amicable relations between the two nations, and the law directing otherwise, upon the ratification of the treaty, is forthwith annulled. Again, if Congress should be of opinion that the offending nation had not complied with their engagements, they might by law revoke the treaty, and place the relation between the two nations upon such footing as they approved. Where is the collision here? I see none. This view of the subject presents an aspect as innocent as that which is produced when a subsequent law repeals a former one. By this interpretation you reconcile one part of the Constitution with another, giving to each a proper effect, a result always desirable, and in rules of construction claiming a precedence to all others. Indeed, sir, I do not see how the power in question could have been otherwise arranged. The power which has been assigned to Congress was indispensable; without it we should have been at the mercy of a foreign Government, who, knowing the incompetency of Congress to act, would have subjected our commerce to the most injurious regulations, as was actually the case before the adoption of the Constitution, when it was managed by the States, by whom no regular system could be established; indeed we all know this very subject was among the most prominent of the causes which produced the Constitution. Had this state of things continued, no nation which could profit by a contrary course would have treated. On the other hand, had not a power been given to some branch of the Government to treat, whatever might have been the friendly dispositions of other Powers, or however desirous to reciprocate beneficial arrangements, they could not, without a treaty-making power lodged somewhere, be realized. I therefore contend, that although to Congress a power is given in the clause alluded to,

to regulate commerce, yet this power is in part, as I have before endeavored to show, given to the President and Senate in their treaty-making capacity—the truth of which position is admitted by the friends of the bill to a certain extent. The fact is, that the only difference between us is to ascertain the precise point where legislative aid is necessary to the execution of the treaty, and where not. To fix this point is to settle the question. After the most mature reflection which I have been able to give this subject, my mind has been brought to the following results: Whenever the President and Senate, within the acknowledged range of their treaty-making power, ratify a treaty upon extra territorial subjects, then it is binding without any auxiliary law. Again, if from the nature of the treaty it is self-executory, no legislative aid is necessary. If, on the contrary, the treaty from its nature cannot be carried into effect but by the agency of the Legislature, that is, if some municipal regulation be necessary, then the Legislature must act not as participating in the treaty-making power, but in its proper character as a legislative body. Examples will serve to illustrate more satisfactorily the view I wish to present. If for an equivalent we had agreed by treaty that our vessels should not pass the Cape of Good Hope or the Straits of Magellan, this being extra territorial, then no law would have been necessary; this I understand is conceded by all parties.

Secondly. If by treaty we agree to surrender prisoners of war, or property taken from the enemy, or, as in the very case under consideration, that for an equivalent we will forbear to exact a higher tonnage duty on British than American ships, then the treaty, as it needs not legislative aid, is self-executory; and, finally, if we had agreed in the last convention that, if the British Government would abstain from impressment, no British sailors should be employed on board American ships, and that those who should offend therein should be obnoxious to a penalty, then the Legislature must act to fix the amount of such penalty, to prescribe the manner in which it should be prosecuted, and to fix the tribunal which should have cognizance of the case. I have thus, as explicitly as it is possible for me, given you my view of the just pretensions of the treaty-making power, on the one hand, and of the legislative on the other. This construction, so palpable to my mind, and so irrefragable, instead of being met by argument, conducted with moderation, and addressed to the understanding, has been assailed elsewhere with every epithet of opprobrium, as leading to a concentration of power in the hands of the President and Senate. If such reveries deserved to be noticed, I will state, with a view to quiet the alarmed, that this now dreaded power was exercised with less security to the nation by the old Congress. There, without the security arising from the approbation of the President, that body enjoyed the treaty-making power to the same extent as it is now exercised. And although this existed in the most disastrous period of the Republic, I have never heard it intimated that the power was abused. Indeed, sir, if the Constitution itself does not form the horizon of my view, and I am at liberty to look to the reasons which influenced the authors of the Constitution to place the treaty-making power where they did, I cannot help believing, that independent of the consideration of a greater degree of secrecy, despatch, &c., which was expected of the Senate, that the elements of which the body is composed, the immediate representatives of the States, in their sovereign capacity, had great weight in the arrangement. The consideration, too, that the small States would be equally represented here with the largest, would not be without its weight. And it is a singular fact, that although a treaty should be ratified by the consent of fourteen States, the representatives from four of the largest States in the Union, in the other branch, could arrest its execution, if that branch of the Government were to participate in the treaty-making power. As I have already taken the liberty, so I must ask for a continuance of the privilege to notice what I have heard said elsewhere, relative to the subject under consideration. It is urged by some, that the control of the sword and the purse is granted to Congress in no other way than their power to regulate commerce; and that if the President and Senate can act independently of the Legislature in one case, so they may in all. Far be from me such an opinion. I unhesitatingly say, that the purse and the sword have been placed under the safeguard of the national will; that any attempt on the part of the President and Senate to exclude the House of Representatives from their share of this trust, would be unconstitutional; and that it would not only be their right, but their duty to oppose it; in this opinion, I feel warranted both by the letter and genius of the Constitution. It is especially declared, by the 6th clause of the 9th section, that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law; if by a treaty, therefore, it is covenanted that money shall be paid, Congress alone is competent to appropriate it, as was done in regard to Jay's Treaty, and that of Louisiana. As to the power of declaring war, it is surely placed in the Congress. This arrangement, which transfers this great attribute of sovereignty from the Executive department of the Government, where with all other nations it is lodged, to the Legislature, is one of the most striking features of our happy form of Government. I will not consent to discuss this question on the contracted scale of a special pleader. In forming my opinion, I shall consult the spirit of the Constitution; it is republican; its foundations rest on the unalienable rights of man; its acts flow directly from the will of the people. Where can the power over the sword and the purse reside with so much safety as in the National Legislature? There it has been placed; had it been otherwise, your Government would have been anything but republican. I pass from this view to that taken by the other side, which admits that the President and Senate have a right to abrogate the declaration of war without the aid of Congress, because to Congress is not given the power to make peace. It is to me most wonderful that gentlemen, instead of relying on the just theory of the Constitution, as ascertained through an enlarged view of the spirit and general organization of that instrument, should be content to rest their opinion on so fallacious a construction; for, were it true, Congress could never repeal a tax or disband an army, however unnecessary they might be esteemed, because no express power to do so had been given them. The true principle is, that Congress alone can declare war. The President and Senate, in their treaty-making capacity, can terminate it; and when peace is established by treaty, an auxiliary law of the Legislature, being unnecessary, is never passed.

The friends of the bill seek to avail themselves of precedents furnished by the British Government, where it is contended treaties are always laid before Parliament to receive their sanction before they become obligatory. I protest against them. The difference between the treaty-making power there and here, is as great as that which separates wisdom from folly, or purity from corruption. There the sole power of making treaties is lodged in an hereditary and irresponsible Chief Magistrate, who may have been placed by accident or crime on the throne, and who may be the most unfit man in the kingdom for any office. His weakness subjects him to the control of secret advisers, who, playing the part of chief jugglers behind the scene, exhibit him as the mere punch of the puppet-show. In a nation having the least pretension to freedom, the official acts of such an officer should be subject to control; unfortunately none substantially exists. I say substantially, for although in point of fact treaties may be carried down to Parliament, it is but matter of form, for we all know that body has long since become an appendage of the Ministry; that they are as obedient to his nod as the needle to the pole. The British Government, in its best form, was but a wretched piece of patch-work—the result of fraud, of accident, or of force. Whatever liberty it might once have possessed is, I fear, forever gone. The anodyne drug of corruption has been administered to the high and the low, till all orders have become contaminated, and the nation is ripening for that inevitable doom which alike awaits nations and individuals. What resemblance exists between that Government and ours in regard to the organization of the power under consideration? Here a Chief Magistrate, called to office by the unbiassed suffrages of millions of freemen, responsible for his acts, and shortly to return to the mass of his fellow-citizens, aided by the direct representatives of the States in their sovereign capacity, two-thirds of whom must concur to give a validity to a treaty. The security against the abuse of power here, is as great as human ingenuity can devise; there as feeble. I therefore renew my protest against precedents drawn from such a source.

I find, sir, I have already exceeded the limits I had prescribed to myself, and I fear taxed your patience to an unreasonable degree. Yet, there are many things still on my mind, to which I wish to give utterance, but I will come to a close. You will perceive, I have discussed the Constitution as it is, not as it should be; that is a question coram non judice. Yet I will say, that for myself, I should feel no kind of solicitude as to the result, were the other House permitted to participate in the treaty-making power. I entirely confide in their patriotism and wisdom. I have no doubt that any treaty which should receive the sanction of the President and two thirds of the Senate, would also meet with the approbation of the House of Representatives. Indeed, sir, when the question was first stirred, I wished to be persuaded, that the other branch had a Constitutional claim to the power they were exercising. All my feelings were in that direction, for they are with me a favorite branch of the Government. Whenever my attention here can be dispensed with, I hasten to the House of Representatives; I hear with rapture their eloquence, I devour with a greedy ear the oracles of their wisdom, and I hope am edified by the lessons of their experience. With those sentiments and feelings I listened to the discussion on this subject, with a wish to be convinced, but I listened in vain. My judgment, after listening attentively to a very long debate, pronounced against their pretensions, and hence I am constrained to give the vote which I shall pronounce; nor shall I fear any of the consequences which have been foretold as likely to arise from this determination, one of which is, that the House of Representatives will dwindle into the contemptible condition of merely registering our edicts. The power they possess, I should imagine, is enough to satisfy the utmost reach of an honorable ambition. But, be that as it may, the people of whom we are both the servants, have prescribed limits to our respective authority. To each, it looks for the preservation of that portion confided to its guardianship. To the Senate, I speak in the spirit of the Constitution, has been confided the solemn trust, not only of guarding the rights of the States, but also, to resist on the one hand the silent current of Executive influence, and on the other, to tell the proud man of popular pretension, thus far you may advance and no farther. It is an awful trust, and wo to him who betrays it. For one, I will place myself on the utmost verge of our authority, and maintain it unimpaired, or, if it be the will of Providence otherwise to direct, to meet my fate, whatever it may be, with fortitude. I hope, sir, in the decision which I am about to pronounce, I have been entirely exempt from the spirit of the corps. Power, for its own sake, has no charm for me. The part I have taken will by all be placed to no other motive than a sense of duty. The unostentatious discharge of one's duty, is like alms given in secret; the reward of both is found in an approving conscience. One other remark, and I am done; it is to repel the insinuation, that with the construction of the treaty-making power, as I contend for it, corruption may find its way to the President and Senate, who may barter away the liberties of the country. If so disastrous a time should ever arrive, as that the President of the United States and two thirds of this body should have become so base as barter their inestimable birthright and that of the nation for a mess of pottage, is it to be believed that the other branch will have escaped the general contagion? If fortunately they have, such an act of the treaty-making power would be as futile as it would be wicked; but, if, which is more probable, the extreme case supposed should occur, corruption will not be confined to this branch, it will have embraced the nation. When that shall be the case, the phraseology of the Constitution, or the arrangement of its powers, will not weigh of the dust of the balance; it will be torn by the rude hand of violence and its fragments given to the wind. These to me are idle fears, and reasoning, if indeed it can be so called, on them, must be fallacious. To reason against the exercise of power, upon the possibility of its abuse, is to oppose at once all delegated authority, and to subvert the Constitution, which rests on a certain portion of morality and patriotism. This security, with the restrictions imposed by the Constitution, the deep interest we all have in common with our fellow-citizens, our accountability to our constituents, but above all the energy of freedom, a devotion to which is interwoven with every ligament of an American bosom, are sufficient guarantees, that in this country power will not be abused, or, if it be, its duration will be short. I say, sir, it is an idle fear, that has no other foundation than the anticipated corruption of the Senate and President. The mode of their election is ample security against the possibility of such a consequence, and I thank my God, that my mind is not able to conceive what shape the temptation would assume that could seduce us from our duty, and still less as it regards the President. He occupies the highest pinnacle of human elevation, which mankind can bestow or man receive. What value could he attach to a diadem or a purple reeking in the gore of his country, when weighed against the spontaneous preference of millions of freemen? And how terrible would be the change of his condition? He now presses his pillow in peace, hushed to repose by the soft whispers of an approving conscience; then, should he even succeed in his wicked attempts, he would be doomed to watch his ill-gotten power "with the sleepless eye of disquieting ambition," and be devoted to the curses of mankind, as the destroyer of the liberty of his country.

I have very imperfectly, I am sure, stated my opinions and the reasons producing them; and I have also endeavored to repel the objections which have been urged on the opposite side. A short recapitulation will close the discussion on my part. I have endeavored to show, that the assignment of power to the General Government, in opposition to that retained by the States, was the important object with the framers of the Constitution. That Congress was made merely the depository in the first instance, of such powers, which were afterwards to be distributed by subsequent provisions in the Constitution among the different branches. I furnished examples in support of this theory, to which I may here add the clause giving to Congress the power of a uniform rule of naturalization, which has been acted upon by the treaty-making power, as in the cases furnished as well by Jay's as the Louisiana Treaty; that as it regards the power in question, namely, that relative to commerce, it is fairly within the range of the treaty-making power. That when this branch of Government acts, it is to a particular extent independent of the Legislature; and when a treaty is self-executory, as in the case under consideration, that no legislative aid is necessary, and that therefore, to say the least of it, this bill is a supererogation; I have also endeavored to fix with precision where legislative aid is necessary; I have surrendered without difficulty the real emblems of sovereignty, the control of the sword and the purse, to the safeguard of the national will; I have endeavored to relieve our construction from the difficulties urged against it, and have endeavored to show that it gives vigor and effect to every part of the Constitution, and obviates all collision; and I have finally endeavored to dispel the fears which have been permitted to arise from the abuse of the power confided to the President and the Senate, by showing that their fidelity is guarantied by every security which human nature can furnish. I will conclude by returning my unfeigned thanks for the marked attention with which I have been favored.

When Mr. B. had concluded—

Mr. FROMENTIN rose and spoke as follows:

Mr. President, I regret that I cannot subscribe to the doctrine laid down by the honorable gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. DAGGETT,) and by the honorable gentleman from New Hampshire, (Mr. MASON.) It is true, that the bill which was sent by the Senate to the House of Representatives on the subject of the Treaty, was received by the House whilst they were engaged in the discussion of a bill on the same subject, and before that bill had been finally agreed to by them; but, sir, it is equally true, that the House of Representatives originated the bill which they have since sent to the Senate, before a bill on the same subject had been thought of in this House. Can it be contended, that either House shall have the right to put an end to the proceedings of the other, by legislating on the same subjects on which they are apprized the other House is actually engaged, and by passing a bill in a hurry, on a motion to dispense with the ordinary rules prescribed for our deliberations; thus actually to prevent the legislative deliberations of another independent body? Sir, I am tenacious of the rights appertaining to this body, not from the motives which have been on more occasions than one illiberally attributed to the Senate, not from the esprit de corps, but because of those rights being delegated to us by the Constitution, I deem it a sacred duty to preserve them inviolate, and to transmit them unimpaired to our successors. The very same reason, sir, makes me not less tenacious of the rights of the other House; and it matters not to me whence the assault proceeds which is directed against the Constitution; as long as I have the honor of a seat in this body, I will, to the utmost of my power, resist every attack against Constitutional rights, whether the attack be directed against this body, or whether it originates in this body against what I conceive to be the Constitutional rights of the other branches of the Government. I cannot, sir, sanction this unwarrantable usurpation of the legislative ground. I said that I regretted that I could not, consistently with my respect for the rights of the other House, agree to the course proposed to be pursued by the two honorable gentlemen who preceded me, and I do most sincerely regret it. Could we pursue that course, and could we anticipate that the House of Representatives, operated upon by similar motives, should treat the bill we have sent them as it is proposed to treat their bill, I should rejoice that both bills should remain inoperative; for, sir, I do not like the bill passed by the Senate much better than the bill passed by the House of Representatives. Both bills, in one respect, are, in my opinion, radically defective. Both bills enact provisions evidently useless; and I hold it, Mr. President, that whatever is useless in legislation, without referring in this particular instance to the risk of establishing a precedent, is never unaccompanied with danger. I would rejoice, sir, if I could devise any possible way of avoiding a discussion upon the subject of the bill on your table. But I know of no way of avoiding it; and at the same time that both the importance of the subject, and our respect for the other House, preclude the idea of either passing or rejecting this bill, sub silentio, it is a matter of congratulation that the principles upon which we are called upon to pronounce are so simple and evident, and the practice which has till now prevailed under them so fully established, that but little need to be said to satisfy the Senate that the bill on your table ought to be rejected.

Mr. President, so much has been said already on this subject, both in the other House and out of doors, that every member of the Senate may be said to be in possession of almost all the arguments for and against the provisions of the bill on your table. In the few observations which I propose making, I will sedulously avoid repeating any of the arguments which I have heard urged upon the subject. The sixth article of the Constitution is as follows: "This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land."

A treaty then is a law; it is not to become a law when an act shall have been passed by Congress to make it so, otherwise the word treaties would have been useless in the article quoted—treaties then being necessarily included under the general term, laws of the United States; it is so, ipso facto. From the moment it has been ratified by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, the Constitution declares that it is the supreme law of the land. Can a law—can what the Constitution declares to be a law—need any further assistance to become so? Can it need the enactment of another law to make it so? Where will this process end? A treaty and an act of Congress are, by the Constitution, put upon the same footing; both are declared to be laws; there cannot be two definitions of a law. If the law, as it results from a treaty, wants the super-enactment of an act of Congress, I can devise no reason why an act of Congress should not require another act of Congress, too, before the first act can be considered as a law. I see no end to this enactment and re-enactment. It has been contended that, admitting the treaty to be a law, still it cannot, unless the provisions of the treaty be re-enacted by Congress, repeal a former law, which is in contradiction to the new law, as it results from the treaty. If this doctrine was true, Mr. President, how is it that Congress did not think it necessary to re-enact the articles of the Treaty of Peace lately concluded with Great Britain? Did not the Treaty of Peace repeal the act of Congress by which war had been declared against Great Britain? Or, will gentlemen contend that this act is not yet repealed—that it is still in force? Are we, then, I ask, still at war with Great Britain? And if we are not—if we are at peace with Great Britain—is not the act declaring war against Great Britain actually repealed; and if it be repealed, is it not repealed by the Treaty of Peace; and if it be repealed by the Treaty of Peace, can it be questioned that a treaty, constitutionally ratified, does actually repeal every law anterior to that treaty, which is in opposition to the provisions of that treaty? Sir, it is a settled principle—a principle which, as far as I am informed, has never been contradicted—that the last law repeals the former law so far as the provisions of the former law are irreconcilable with the provisions of the latter; and if the practice had not obtained of inserting a repealing clause in such of our acts as are in contradiction with former acts on the same subject, those former acts, thus in contradiction, should, nevertheless, be repealed. The repealing clause in our acts is, it is true, the declaration of the repeal; but the repeal is actually produced by the enactment of the provisions of the law at war with the preceding law. The preceding law is actually repealed by the law imposing obligations, or prescribing duties incompatible with the obligations imposed, or the duties prescribed by a former law. For instance, take the act of Congress admitting the State of Louisiana into the Union; that act does not contain any clause to repeal the acts formerly passed by Congress for the government of the portion of territory now known by the name of the State of Louisiana. Will it be contended that these acts are not repealed, quite as much repealed, as if a repealing clause had been inserted in the act for the admission of Louisiana; and if those acts be repealed, is it not because their provisions are irreconcilable with the provisions of the late act; and does not that example, among many others which I might have selected, establish fully the principle which I contend for; that, without the superfluous provisions of a repealing clause, such provisions of any law, incompatible with the provisions of a later law, are necessarily and ipso facto repealed by the provisions of the later law; and if this be undeniable with respect to one description of laws, is it not so with respect to laws of every other description? If it be true with respect to the acts of Congress, is it not true with respect to laws resulting from a treaty made under the authority of the United States? Sir, this House cannot get rid of the dilemma; either you cannot repeal former laws by the enactment of later laws in contradiction of the former, without a repealing clause—and I have proved that you did it—or what you may do by the enactment of one of the description of laws known to our Constitution, without a repealing clause, may be done by another description of laws equally known to our Constitution, without the assistance of a repealing clause.

Mr. President, can it be apprehended that this clause in the Constitution, “under the authority of the United States,” will be construed to include, by implication, very far-fetched implication indeed, the House of Representatives, which truly does constitute a no inconsiderable share of the authority of the United States? but can no more, on that account, consider itself as constituting an essential indispensable part of every power necessary for all the acts which are to be done under the authority of the United States. Sir, these words, “the authority of the United States,” are very broad; they cover an immense ground. But can they ever be supposed to mean, that every authority in the United States is to be consulted before any act can have validity which is to be done under the authority of the United States? Extensive, no doubt, and very properly so, but not unlimited, are the rights of the House of Representatives; and, like every other branch of the Government, in this our Government of checks, thus far, to wit: as far as the Constitution has vested the right in the House of Representatives. Thus far has she a right to go, but no farther; and it is the bounden duty of the Senate to resist, on the part of the House, as well as on the part of the Executive, any attempt at an encroachment of rights which, by the Constitution, are vested in the Senate. Sir, if the words, “under the Constitution of the United States,” did, in the present instance, necessarily include the House of Representatives, it is difficult to conceive why the Convention, instead of using the words, “authority of the United States,” did not use the words, “authority of Congress.” The clause where these words are to be found, is not the clause of the Constitution by which the power of making or ratifying treaties is delegated, but an annunciation only of what in future the people of the United States declare they will consider as a treaty binding upon them; it will be a treaty made under the authority of the United States; that is, a treaty made by that authority in the United States to which the power has been delegated by the Constitution to make treaties, which shall be binding upon the people of the United States. Give me leave to add here, by way of rendering every obstacle which might be attempted to be erected on the forced construction of these words, that their insertion in the article of the Constitution, where they are to be found, originated in the necessity of discriminating between treaties made under the authority of the United States, and treaties made under the authority of some individual State. Every body who is conversant with the history of the United States at the time the Constitution was framed, knows that several States had been making treaties; some treaties were in fact pending between some States, and some nations of Indians, at the time the Constitution was adopted. The United States, by adopting the clause, "under the authority of the United States," gave public notice that they should not consider themselves as bound by any treaty made by individual States; but by such only as should be made under the authority of the United States; that is, by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, which, according to the Constitution, are, as far as respects the power of making treaties, binding on this nation—the authority of the United States. Sir, the President and the Senate of the United States are the attorneys, in fact, of the people of the United States, to make, in their name, with a foreign nation, every contract which they conceive to be demanded for the interest of the people of the United States. Suppose I gave you a power of attorney to sell for me, and in my name, a tract of land on certain stipulated conditions, to be fulfilled by the purchaser. On the fulfilment of those conditions, you have agreed, under the authority which I had vested in you by the letter of attorney, that I should convey the land. The conditions have been fulfilled on the part of the purchaser, and he applies to me to convey the land accordingly. Could I, Mr. President, under these circumstances, be admitted to plead that there was too much danger in the exercise of the power by me delegated to an individual thus to bind me; and would not the court compel me to fulfil all the engagements entered into by the attorney, in fact, to whom I should have delegated the power to bind me: provided he had not, in that respect, exceeded the powers expressed in the letter of attorney? Sir, if the President and Senate have not, in the making of a treaty, exceeded the powers given to them by the Constitution, it is the duty of Congress not to re-enact its provisions, to give it a validity which may be supposed to be wanting; but to pass such laws as may be necessary to give it effect, which laws are to be built upon, and made conformable to the provisions of the treaty, because that instrument is valid, and in full force from the moment of its ratification, according to the Constitution.

Having thus endeavored, Mr. President, to demonstrate, from the plain, unsophisticated exposition of the words of the Constitution, the meaning, the only meaning which they appear to me to be susceptible of, I will add a few words to show that the practice, till now, under our Constitution, comes in aid of the construction I have contended for. I have already mentioned the Treaty of Peace lately concluded with Great Britain, as a satisfactory proof that the House of Representatives did not, at that time, deem it necessary that the provisions of a treaty should be re-enacted by Congress to repeal any law in existence prior to the conclusion of that treaty. I could refer, in support of the same doctrine, to the numberless treaties which have been made with the Indians since the organization of our Government. But, sir, I mean to be very short, and I come at once to a treaty which not only bore upon our commercial regulations, but which appropriated an immense sum of money, a larger sum of money than was ever appropriated by any other law; and, sir, I hope to be able to demonstrate that a claim was set up at that time, by the House of Representatives, for the exercise of the high pretensions which they have now, for the first time, manifested. If I should succeed in establishing this fact, I think I shall have proved, satisfactorily, both that the letter of the Constitution, and that the practice of the Government under it, repel the idea that the consent of the House of Representatives is necessary to give validity to a treaty, or, which is the same thing, to repeal any law which should be irreconcilable with that treaty; for, sir, I cannot conceive of the existence of two contradictory laws being in force at the same time, in the same country, on the same subject; and it must follow, of course, as attempted to be established before, that the latter repeals the former law.

The treaty I allude to, sir, is the treaty concluded at Paris on the 30th of April, 1803, between the United States and France. This treaty and the several conventions signed at the same date, annexed to the said treaty, approved, ratified, and exchanged, in the same form, at the same time, and jointly with the said treaty, and as much a part of the said treaty as if the clauses in the two conventions had been inserted in the said treaty, stipulated certain commercial regulations, and contained provisions for the payment of a sum of fifteen millions of dollars. What was the conduct of Congress at that time? Did the House of Representatives of those days, which have been very often mentioned as the golden age of pure, unadulterated republicanism in this country—did the House of Representatives contend, that the treaty could not be carried into effect, until the provisions of the treaty had been by them re-enacted in the shape of an act of Congress? No, sir, such doctrine was not dreamt of then. The House of Representatives considered the treaty as the supreme law of the land. They did not question the right, nor did they indulge in speculations upon the possible corruption of a future President and Senate. They took the treaty to be the supreme law of the land. They did, with respect to the treaty, what the first Congress, which assembled under our present form of Government did, with respect to the Constitution. They did not re-enact the provisions of the treaty, as the first Congress did not re-enact the articles of the Constitution. But, as, in compliance with the articles of the Constitution, the first Congress enacted the necessary laws to carry that Constitution into effect; so did the eighth Congress, in compliance with the articles of the Treaty of Paris, concluded on the 30th of April, 1803, pass the necessary laws to carry that treaty into effect. Accordingly, sir, we find that on the 31st of October, 1803, the Congress of the United States passed an act, a very short act, sir, only two sections, to enable the President of the United States to take possession of the territories ceded by France to the United States, by the treaty concluded at Paris on the 30th of April last, and for the temporary government thereof. This act, as I before said, is very short; give me leave to read it. [The act was read.] As you see sir, this act does not contain any such provisions as are contained in the act on your table. Not one of the articles of the treaty is mentioned in that act. No section is to be found in it making an appropriation for fifteen millions of dollars; no section to extend the rights of American citizens to the inhabitants of the ceded territories; no section to alter our commercial relations, with respect to France and Spain, so far as relates to the privileges to be granted to the vessels of those two countries, in the ports of the ceded territories. No, sir, not one word is whispered about these mighty and most important points; and yet, sir, the treaty which contains all these important stipulations is a law. The House of Representatives, who either originated or gave their assent to the act which I read—I know not which, nor can I now ascertain—but it is quite immaterial—the House of Representatives, I say, by passing that act, proclaimed to the world, not only that the treaty, without their approbation, was the supreme law of the land, but that they themselves considered it so. As far as the doctrine of precedents may go, the House of Representatives are concluded upon this point.

Will it be said, sir, that laws were passed afterwards by Congress for the creation of stock, for the payment of claims of citizens of the United States on the Government of France, and for other purposes, some of which, not all, sir, are the same, as some of the purposes intended to be effected by the treaty? This objection may postpone the decision of the question, by necessitating a further answer. It cannot alter that decision. Give me leave, Mr. President, to answer this objection by putting a question myself to the advocates of the claims of the House of Representatives on this floor. Can an instrument of writing be a treaty, and no treaty, at the same time? Can the House of Representatives, admitting them to have the right to refuse to pass such laws as may be necessary to carry into effect a treaty, duly and constitutionally approved and ratified by the President—by and with the advice and consent of the Senate—can, I say, the House of Representations of a treaty, without, at the same time, admitting that such other stipulations of the same treaty, without which, the particular article for the giving effect to which, they have passed laws, should not have been agreed to, are as binding as the particular article to which they have given effect by a law? And how, sir, can those other stipulations be binding unless they be a law? In the treaty to which I have referred, there are two prominent stipulations, to wit: a cession of the province of Louisiana by France to the United States, and a promise, by the United States, to pay fifteen millions of dollars to France. By the act of the 31st of October, 1803, the President of the United States is authorized to take possession of Louisiana; but the United States are not bound by the same act to pay France fifteen millions of dollars; yet Congress knew very well, when they passed the act authorizing the President to take possession of Louisiana, that there had been contracted for on the part of the United States, an obligation to pay fifteen millions of dollars for that purpose. Possession could not be taken without providing for the payment; yet not a word is said about making provision for the payment, and possession is ordered to be taken. Sir, provision was made for the payment. The House then considered the obligation to pay the fifteen millions of dollars stipulated to be paid by the President and the Senate as complete, as binding, as beyond their control; they knew, they confessed, that the treaty was the supreme law of the land; they knew that they could not add to, or detract from the obligations of a treaty by any act of theirs; they said nothing, sir. It is true that they passed afterwards the necessary laws to carry into effect the provisions of the treaty; and, among others, the provisions which had stipulated the payment and mode of payment of the fifteen millions of dollars. But, sir, the passing of those several acts, even according to the doctrine of the most strenuous advocates for the claims of the House of Representatives, does not alter the position I maintain. The passing of those acts was forced upon them. After carrying into effect one article of the treaty, they were bound to carry every other article into effect. These acts, sir, posterior to the 31st of October, 1803, do not re-enact the articles of the treaty. They do not contract the obligation; they provide for the fulfilment of the obligations contracted by the paramount law. They are handmaids to the law resulting from the treaty. The treaty then was law before the enactment of those acts; and so, sir, is the treaty lately concluded, without any of the enactments in the bill on your table. During the time which elapsed, after passing the act of the 31st of October, 1803, until the time when the several acts were passed, which provided for the carrying into effect other articles of the treaty, those articles were certainly the law of the land; and if they were, they were so, not because re-enacted by Congress, since it is confessed on all hands that they had not then been re-enacted—they were so then only because they were inserted in the treaty. The treaty then was a law, without the re-enactment of the articles it contained by Congress.

One word more, Mr. President, and I have done. By the treaty of the 30th of April, 1803, the rights and privileges of American citizens were extended to all the inhabitants of the territory ceded by that treaty to the United States. Not only has no act been passed by Congress re-enacting the article of the treaty which confers those rights and privileges on the people of the ceded territory; but, sir, it is not improper to remark, that the treaty, so far as relates to the granting of those rights and privileges, operates as a repealing clause of the several statutes passed by Congress prescribing the mode by which foreigners are to be naturalized. How, I ask, how could this have taken place, if the eighth Congress had not considered that the treaty was a law, and not only that it was a law, but that it was a law repealing ipso facto all the acts of Congress which were in opposition to the treaty? From this view of the subject, I cannot hesitate a moment in voting for the rejection of the bill on your table.

When Mr. F. had taken his seat—

Mr. ROBERTS addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President: Seeing no one about to occupy the floor, I rise, though ill prepared, to offer my opinion. I should do it under any circumstances with great diffidence. Having been under an impression there was no disposition to enter into a discussion of this bill, I had too much neglected turning my thoughts to its provisions, until gentlemen, holding different opinions from those I am compelled to form, had invited discussion, and almost made it unavoidable. I yesterday moved an adjournment, with a view to a better consideration of the subject; and have since devoted to it some attention. I have found it one of the most serious character, as it goes to fix a high and important construction of the Constitutional law. The ultimate effects of the decision which may be now made, if it results in a rejection of the bill, must be momentous, however light its immediate ones may be esteemed. Gentlemen who have preceded me on the other side of the question, have the advantage of being familiarized with this sort of discussion, from their professional pursuits. [Mr. BARBOUR disclaimed being of that character.] The gentleman from Virginia, said Mr. R., disclaims the professional character. I beg his pardon; the other gentlemen I apprehend are of that character, at least.

This question, Mr. President, presents nothing beyond the comprehension of a plain mind, and ordinary application.

Several exceptions have been taken to this bill. It has been objected to on the point of etiquette. It is said it is materially variant from the one passed on the same subject by this body, after solemn and deliberate consideration; and that consistency demands of us its rejection. Lastly, it is objected, that it is unnecessary, and must, if passed, be of evil consequences. This last objection, if found valid, must be fatal. I proceed to show it is not.

The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BARBOUR) has laid down the question now before us. "Does a treaty repeal a law that has had the sanction of Congress, without its consent?" I should rather state it—"Does a treaty, ratified by two-thirds of the Senate and President, become a law without legislative sanction?" I contend it cannot constitutionally. In adducing proof of this, I shall not recur to precedents, often inapplicable, and never satisfactory in the settlement of just principles of legal construction. The Constitution is the only safe authority to which an appeal can be made, in order to ascertain what powers are possessed by any branch of Government. In referring to this instrument, it is worthy of remark, that it is a specimen almost without parallel of concise and comprehensive diction. It contains few redundant words, and forming a whole, which must be kept in view, to a just construction of its parts.

The first section of the first article declares, "all legislative power shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives." This short clause, Mr. President, will be found to have a predominating influence through the whole instrument. The language is so strong, and so comprehensive, that nothing can impair its force but a modification of its meaning, express and palpable. No construction by implication, however strong, can be adequate. All power of making laws shall be vested in a Congress: it must be worse than absurdity to say, then, that a treaty can become a law of the land, without its approbation. The following sections provide for organizing the Senate and House of Representatives, and defining the powers of each: In the eighth section, we find what Congress have power to do. This section closes with a clause of especial importance in our present inquiry. We find here that, "Congress shall have power to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers, vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department thereof." In coming at a correct construction of a law, much depends on a correct interpretation of words. Those passages show that all powers to make laws, for carrying into execution every power vested in the Government, or any department thereof, (most obviously the treaty-making power is here included,) is by the Constitution vested in Congress. Here is an especial reference, not only to foregoing powers, but all other powers, subsequent as well as precedent. A legislative power is a power to give laws. All legislative power is given to Congress, and no other department of the Government can exercise it. If a treaty be a law, to any affirmative effect, it can only become so when it has been sanctioned by the Senate and House of Representatives. That the treaty-making power is not a law-making power, I consider as already established, by the most certain construction of the Constitution. But, by pursuing the examination of its other provisions, we shall find in them confirmation strong to demonstration. The ninth section contains exceptions out of, and limitations on the legislative power, and every other power in the Government. It does not only say they shall not legislate on the subjects enumerated, but no power in the Government shall infringe upon them. The delegated authorities are severally and collectively inhibited from any interference with them. One of the exceptions is, "that no tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State." Another is, "no money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in consequence of appropriations made by law." It will be admitted by all, that the meaning of the word law, as used here, is a rule prescribed by Congress. A treaty, then, the provisions of which require appropriations to carry them into effect, cannot become an operative law, though ratified by two-thirds of the Senate and President, till Congress have by law appropriated money to carry it into execution. The ratification of a treaty, then, is obviously a very different authority from that of passing laws to execute it. But, it has been said, a treaty when ratified becomes a law, imposing on Congress the duty to make appropriations, without option. This conclusion must be incorrect—first, because it goes to make the President and Senate the legislative authority, and the Senate and House of Representatives, the Executive authority—second, because legislation must of necessity be an act of free will, from motives of expediency—and third, if the Legislature refuse to appropriate, there can be no coercive remedy. If a treaty, when ratified, becomes a law, it must be a law adequate to appropriating money, subject to be drawn from the Treasury, without the consent of Congress. The argument leads to this conclusion, or it means nothing. It would not have been more obviously improper, to have stipulated with Britain, in the convention this bill is intended to carry into execution, for the levy of a duty on articles exported into the United States, equal to the existing duty on British exports. This seems to be the unavoidable, embarrassing construction that arises from attempting to build up a sovereign and little limited power, on an insulated phrase of the Constitution, without reference to the context.

"Congress," Mr. President, "have power to raise and support armies, but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years." Now, if the treaty-making power can make a law, as is contended by the objectors to this bill, that imposes on Congress the duty of appropriating money, on the same principle they can certainly make a law, by treaty, to raise and support armies. Having reference to the usages of nations, nothing is more common in treaties of alliance than stipulations for keeping up a standing military force. The Constitution has, however, in this Government, intrusted the power of raising armies, to Congress alone. Nay—the House of Representatives are made the especial guardians against the misuse of this high trust. The appropriations are limited to two years. A new House of Representatives must assent to their longer continuance. What becomes of this important check, if the treaty-making power is magnified into a high and sovereign legislative authority? But some gentlemen have confined it to international concerns. But their objection to this bill extends it to concerns that are national. They contend the treaty is a law, without the consent of Congress; if so, it goes to impair the revenue, by a very considerable diminution of the duties on imports and tonnage. My friend from South Carolina, (Mr. TAYLOR,) yesterday justly remarked, that we had heard much about legislative pledges of faith to the public creditors; and he had been taught to believe, that when made by both Houses of Congress, they could not be violated, but by consent of both. Reject this bill, and the Senate withdraw the pledge, without the consent of the House, and have no power to originate a substitute. If then the doctrine, that the treaty-making power is a paramount power, exclusively vested in the President and Senate, with no other limit than their discretion, as to what are fit objects for it to act upon, and that their ratification binds the nation, as gentlemen have contended, all the limitations on the legislative power in the Constitution are frivolous, to say no more, and nugatory. If treaties, when ratified merely, are the supreme law of the land, the amendatory clause in the Constitution is of little value. When a treaty is made a law, by sanction of the authority of the United States, whatever that authority may be found to be, it becomes a pact, binding on this nation as a contracting party, till the other party infracts the covenant, or it is done by us by act equivalent to that of war. These may be of lasting effect, and thus the President and Senate may even preclude the benefit of amendment. Thus too must be opened, if gentlemen's construction is true, a broad and extensive field for gradual and dangerous encroachments on the liberties of this people.

In the second article, Mr. President, we find it provided, that "the Executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America;" all power to make laws, to carry into effect any powers vested in the Government, or any department thereof, is vested in Congress. Executive power is a power that has "the quality of performing active, not deliberative, not legislative." No two powers can be in their nature more distinct; nay, even more opposite. In the Constitutional allotment of the Executive duties, this distinctness is preserved with great precision. "The President shall be Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, and of the militia when called into actual service;" but, "Congress shall pass laws for calling out the militia, governing" &c. The duty of the President is strictly executive. He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, two-thirds of the Senators concurring, to make treaties; and he shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate appoint ambassadors; and shall take care the laws be faithfully executed. I cannot find, by the remotest implication, any authority, either in the general grant, or in the enumeration of Executive powers given to the President, or conjointly to him and the Senate, anything like Legislative authority, except, indeed, it be drawn from the cabalistic words make treaties. On the simple verb to make, gentlemen rest their construction to deprive the House of Representatives, the most confidential branch of the Government, of their voice in making laws of the land. As well might it be said the appointment of an ambassador had the effect of law, and his outfit and salary followed as matter of course. Make, we understand, is equivalent to, "to form of materials." As soon, then, as the elements of a treaty are embodied, the stimulus of ratification is to give life and activity to the instrument, beyond the control of the people's representatives, though ever so subversive of their rights. But gentlemen attempt to extend their ground of construction, by referring to the sixth article, which reads, "this Constitution, and the laws of the United States, which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby." The words "under the authority of the United States," have been conveniently passed over, or slightly noticed. They are not surplusage—their meaning is important—a treaty not made under the authority of the United States shall not be the law of the land. Here it is plain and palpable the legislative authority is included, else why all the checks and limitations on that authority?

The judicial power is to extend to "all cases in law and equity arising under the Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties which shall be made under their authority." Thus, twice is enumerated, in what order the Constitution, the laws, and treaties made under the authority of the United States, shall stand. In both cases it is precisely the same, treaties are in the third place. To make them obligatory on the State judges, they must be sanctioned by the authority of the United States. The House of Representatives have by solemn and deliberate act emphatically declared, in their opinion, the commercial convention with Great Britain will not have been made a law of the land under the authority of the United States, without the consent of the Senate and House of Representatives in their legislative capacity. This at least proves the competency of the treaty-making power doubtful—where doubts exist, it is the safer way to remove them, when it can be done. If the most numerous, and not the less enlightened branch of the Legislature doubt, may not the State judges doubt, and thus a case arise where one authority conflicts with another about what is law? The remedy for this evil is easy, is safe; render to the legislative authority what is its due.

We have been told, Mr. President, the treaty-making power is the highest power exercised in any community; that it is a sovereign power. I apprehend this language is much too strong, unless it is meant to say it has no limits but in the discretion of those who exercise it. If, as we are told, this power, when exercised by the proper authority, binds the nation, and that proper authority comes from the words make treaties, then will I admit it is a sovereign power indeed. Happily, however, I find by the Constitution a treaty law has no peculiar preference to a statute law. The former has the third place, and the same power can abrogate either. But treaty-making is not the highest act of power in this community—levying war and taxes, and regulating justice, are powers of a higher character, and equally sovereign. But, gentlemen have admitted this power must be applied to a fit subject to bind the nation. The other branch of the Legislature says, the treaty in question goes to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and Congress can only do this by law. Here then is not a fit subject, and I apprehend few will be found that do not require the assent of the House of Representatives to make a law.

The treaty-making power, we are told, cannot touch the sword and the purse—these are guaranteed to the national will. This leaves little to contend about. The treaty-making power, if it even be a substantive power, will have limited exercise if it touches not the sword and the purse. I do not know if I can enumerate the catalogue of treaty topics. There are treaties of peace, of amity and commerce, of alliance, offensive and defensive, of limits, of cession, and of subsidy. Which of these can be touched without contact with the power of the purse and the sword? I see none but a treaty of peace; it wants no affirmation. I contend, however, that no treaty which has any operative or active character, can have the effect of law without interfering with the authority vested in Congress, as much as those relating to the purse and the sword. The gentleman from New Hampshire (Mr. MASON) asks, was the power of making a treaty in the President and Senate when the commercial convention with Britain was made? and adds, they have it, or it is nowhere granted. I think I have proved it is granted, and that they have it not. The gentleman thinks the treaty-making power does not interfere with the power of Congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations. If treaty regulations made by the President and Senate be law, they not only repeal statutes and supersede the power of legislation for the time being, but during the existence of the treaty. This is a construction of the legislative power to regulate commerce, without the consent of the most important branch of Congress. In this case it will be against their expressed will. The legislative is a grand power, says the gentleman; the treaty-making authority is a special one. How is a special incidental power, let me ask, by any sound rule of construction, to obliterate a grand leading power, such as that of legislation? This disposition to aggrandize the treaty-making power on the ruins of legislative authority, results in perpetual absurdity. Better to leave the treaty making power, the gentleman tells us, where the people have placed it; it is there I wish it to remain, and the legislative power also. It is not as to who are constitutionally authorized to make treaties we differ, but to whom it is given to make them law? It is an Executive power in its nature, says the gentleman, and every wise nation has placed it there. So far as negotiation is concerned, it is Executive; so far as ratification is concerned, it is Executive; but the Executive cannot make it a law without usurpation of the Legislative authority. When the Executive proceeds to make laws he becomes a legislator, and we arrive at the absurdity of despotism by making his will the law of the land. The gentleman from New Hampshire (Mr. MASON) says the "law of the land" is a common law term; but are we thence to go to common law legislation to learn how the Executive can make treaties the law of the land? A judicial decision cannot make treaties the law of the land, contrary to the will of the Legislature, without usurpation.

Gentlemen recur to the era of our Government to show it was designed to strengthen the Federal authority; and tell us power is parcelled out to the different departments. This affords a good rule by which to construe the Constitution. It contains provisions for a due and distinct exercise of all necessary powers for the administration of a just and free Government—on the one hand, strong enough to secure social security and happiness; and on the other, restrained from invading either by a due division and definition of authority. A desire to invest one authority with increased power by construction, must destroy the symmetry of the system, if not the system itself. The high powers of legislation are checked by two co-ordinate branches, and an Executive negative, and they ought never to be exercised in any other manner. There cannot, then, be two laws at once; there can be no conflict, no doubt, no difficulty. All laws will then emanate from the same source, as the sages who framed our Government intended. The House of Representatives have invited us to this course by their bill.

The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BARBOUR) seems disposed to resolve the question into one of great and small States. He conceives four States might, on a treaty question in the House of Representatives, control fourteen. He recalled the statement, but his error, in point of numbers, was small; one vote, added to those of the four largest States, would make a quorum of that House. But, in point of fact, I think he is in error—no evil can arise from this circumstance—no treaty can be ratified without passing as much within the power of the small States as the large ones, nor go before the House. The House will reject no treaty but on strong grounds. The welfare of the small States cannot be more deeply staked in a treaty than that of the large ones in the event of its passage or rejection. If the President and Senate can make treaties laws of the land by their ratification, who shall conserve the rights of the large States, when numbers are so much against them?

The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BARBOUR) has contended, that the Congress have power to establish a uniform rule of naturalization; it has been ceded, by Jay's Treaty, that the treaty-making power can, under its legitimate exercise, reciprocally naturalize the natives of the United States, and of the country of the other contracting party. An appeal to that treaty will not warrant such a construction. It is drawn up with the strictest care not to encroach on the power of Congress to establish a uniform rule of naturalization. With the indulgence of the Senate, I will read the article: "Such settlers and traders as shall continue to reside within the boundary lines, shall not be compelled to become citizens of the United States, or to take any oath of allegiance to the Government thereof, but they shall be at full liberty so to do if they think proper; and they shall make and declare their election in one year after the evacuation aforesaid. And all persons who shall continue there after the expiration of the said year, without having declared their intention of remaining subjects of His Britannic Majesty, shall be considered as having elected to become citizens of the United States." It is unnecessary to remark, that all this stipulation provides for, is the option to become, or not to become, citizens. It merely engages for the United States, that no law shall be passed to prevent such as do not elect to remain, British subjects, to take an oath of allegiance and become citizens of the United States. The gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. FROMENTIN) has referred to the treaty ceding that country to the United States, to show that it trenched upon the powers of Congress, in respect to naturalization and regulating commerce. The article of that treaty which provides for the admission of that territory into the Union as States, is expressly worded so as not to infract the Constitution. So much did the President believe the sanction of Congress necessary to carry that treaty into execution, that, immediately on its ratification, he sent a message to Congress, pressing the speedy enactment of laws to give it effect. But I cannot find the slightest evidence of the President, as negotiator, showing any disposition to act under a construction of exercising a sovereign power. In page eighteen of the Executive papers of the second session of the twelfth Congress, we find these instructions: "As an inducement to Great Britain to discontinue the practice of impressment from American vessels, you may give assurance that a law will be passed (to be reciprocal) to prohibit the employment of British seamen in the public or commercial service of the United States." Mr. Russell explains to the British Minister, that this assurance is given, under the sense of the Federal Constitution; that is, that it involved the assent of Congress, over whom the Executive had no control. Our Commissioners, in negotiating the convention in question, referred to a law of last session, to show the sense of the legislative authority, and to give assurance of their concurrence in stipulations to equivalent effect. This law had been forwarded as instruction, no doubt.

The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BARBOUR) seems aware that his construction may be thought to vest a dangerous power in the President and Senate; two-thirds of the Senate, says he, must ratify a treaty, they are elected by the Legislatures of the States, and are men who have gone through the ordeal of State office. The President, he adds, is elected by the people, and must be a man distinguished for his virtue and services. But, Mr. President, however the mode of constituting the Executive and the Senate may promise the obtaining of good men, it is obvious and palpable, that they are not the favorite depositories of high discretionary trust in the Constitution. The House of Representatives only can originate revenue bills. The House of Representatives are to check the appropriations for the support of armies once in two years. While the gentleman is talking about the confidence due to the Senate, we all remember, at the era our Government was established, opinions were held by some not very partial to free Government. Such opinions are still held. We can all remember with what feelings the first Senate assembled; what questions were discussed, and what projects were contemplated. Public opinion has made these feelings in some degree disappear; but, in the nature of things, we may look for more here than in the House of Representatives. If we look to the powers, the paucity of numbers, the period of office, or the mode of election, for this body; are they calculated most to allay or excite jealousy? The plain letter of the Constitution gives the President and Senate power enough, without extending it by constructive authority, raised on vague implication.

We are not to look for the destruction of the liberties of this people, from a single stride of authority, but by one branch arrogating to itself power with the concurrence of another, to the disparagement of a third. It must be by artful and gradual encroachment, under cover of forced construction, and by a cautious application of power thus obtained. Hence, we are taught to fear the effect of the precedent the rejection of this bill might establish, more especially as it would set at naught the solemn opinion of the House of Representatives.

The gentleman from Virginia remarks, he has endeavored to discuss the question as he finds the Constitution; were a proposition to amend it before us, he could have no difficulty. I request him to examine it anew; I think, fairly interpreted, it is what he could wish it. Let us leave law-making and treaty-making where the people have placed it. Then, indeed, shall we have done justice to the wisdom of those sages who formed the Constitution. We are asked, if the President and Senate become corrupt, what will there be to preserve the House of Representatives? I answer, frequent election, and greater numbers.

Need I now remark, Mr. President, that I think this bill necessary; all I have said goes to prove it. I had thought yesterday to offer an amendment, not very dissimilar to the bill we have sent to the House of Representatives—I had prepared it. Better reflection convinces me this bill is necessary. Its enactments are precisely correspondent with the provisions of the commercial convention with Great Britain. It will not be enough that the courts shall look to that instrument for the law, the statute ought also to be before them.

On the subject of etiquette, it ill becomes us to be very punctilious. The bill passed by this body was not, on my part, a very deliberate act; nor was it to be looked for, that it should have arrested the House on the passage of their own bill, from the time of its arrival on their table.

It has been my desire, Mr. President, to preserve that coolness in the delivery of my sentiments which is due to this body, and the dignity of the subject. Declamation and rhetorical flourish has been made to give place to sober examination, and a desire only to justify what I find to be my duty, in the vote I am to give. My conviction is clear, the bill ought to pass.

When Mr. ROBERTS sat down—

Mr. MACON, of North Carolina, said, as the reading of the bill which had passed the Senate twice on the same day, had been noticed, and that too with reference to a rule which made it necessary for the second reading to be by the unanimous consent of the House, he felt it his duty to state, that when it was read the second time, it was not on his table, and that while it was reading the third time, it was laid on it wet, not in time to be read before the bill was passed. He did not object to the third reading, because he had but a few days before taken his seat, and did not like so very soon to be the only objecting member, to that which appeared to be the general wish of the Senate. He did not blame any one for the reading of the bill twice on the same day that it passed; if blame attached to any person, it was to himself. He had frankly stated the grounds on which he acted; perhaps it might be a sort of false delicacy. He considered it due to the Senate to say that, when, on the next day, he objected to the reading of a bill a second time on the same day, it was done under the painful recollection of what had taken place the day before, and with no view to delay the public business, or to thwart the inclination of the Senate.

Mr. M. said, as he was now up, he should give some of the reasons which would induce him to vote for the bill from the House of Representatives—in doing which he promised to be very short. He agreed with the gentlemen who differed with him as to the propriety of passing the bill, that the Constitution should be so construed as to give to every part its full effect, and to every department of the Government the power allotted to it, and that no department should attempt to encroach on the power delegated to another. If one should unfortunately make the attempt, he would add that it ought to be immediately resisted. With respect to what had been said about the House of Representatives, he would only observe that he had been a member of it, and never witnessed an attempt to encroach on the powers delegated to others; nor did he believe a case could be found which would establish the fact that the attempt had been made. The time of their service forbids it. The attempt will never be made by either House, unless there shall be much of what is called the spirit of the corps among the members, and two years is too short time for much to be acquired. Certainly a great deal more may be acquired in six; nor can it be supposed that the numbers of that House can so readily acquire it as the few of this. The time of service is as one to three, and the number of members somewhere about five to one. The time of service is two years shorter than that of the President, and that of the Senate two years longer; it would, therefore, seem that if any two of the legislative departments were to combine (he spoke only of the qualified legislative character of the President) to encroach on the powers delegated to the other, that the time of service would be a great consideration in forming the combination, and that would be sufficient to prevent the House of Representatives from being one.

If the treaty-making power be as great as has been contended for, it appeared to him that the House of Representatives had but two powers which might not be taken away by it, neither of which were of the most pleasant kind—one to impeach, the other to originate revenue bills. The last mentioned, the late treaty has slightly and indirectly touched. If the assent of the House be not necessary to repeal the law imposing higher duties on foreign ships, and goods imported in them, than on American ships, and goods imported in them, the treaty does not originate a revenue bill, but it lessens the tax on foreign ships, and goods imported in them, according to the opinion of those who oppose the bill, and that too pledged for the payment of the public debt. To lessen a tax, seems to be about the same thing as to repeal a higher and lay a lower tax on the same article. If the President and Senate can lessen one tax by treaty, they most assuredly can every one. Of what value, then, is the power to originate revenue bills, or legislative pledges for the payment of the debt, if the two departments of the Government which cannot originate a revenue bill, nor of themselves pledge the revenue, can, by treaty with a foreign Power, reduce the taxes, and, to the amount reduced, do away the pledge. To make such a power work well, it ought to have the authority to originate revenue bills, pass and pledge them, or to compel the House of Representatives to give their aid to carry their measures into execution. The House of Representatives, like every deliberative assembly, cannot act under compulsion, but must act, to act rightly, according to its own judgment and discretion. If a treaty can reduce a tax without the consent of the House of Representatives, why not raise one? Nothing seems more clear than that it ought to require the same power to do either of the acts. But to make this, if possible, more plain, he would ask what would have been thought of the Constitution at the time it was considered and debated in the State conventions which adopted it, if, at the end of the article which delegates legislative power to Congress, not to the President and Senate, a clause had been added to this effect, that the President and Senate might, by a treaty with a foreign Government, repeal whatever acts Congress might pass? If they can repeal one, they may every one; and if they can reduce the tax beforementioned, they can undoubtedly repeal it; and if the treaty-making power can of itself rightfully act on one of the powers delegated to Congress, it can on all. If the construction which the friends of the bill oppose be the true one, then the Constitution would not have been changed by the supposed additional clause. The gentleman from Virginia will pardon me for saying, that no clause can be found in the Constitution which secures to the House of Representatives, or to Congress, the sword and the purse, if the power to lay and collect duties and imposts, and to regulate trade, is not. Every power delegated to Congress is in the same article. There is no exception in favor of the sword or purse; if the treaty-making power includes one, it must all, for all are granted alike. The late treaty touches the purse to the amount of the tax reduced.

If the assent of Congress be not necessary to equalize the duties on foreign and American ships and goods imported in them, why pass the act of the last session, which contains the principle of the bill, and ought to be considered as settling the question? The bill ought now to pass, or the act, to say the least of it, was useless; because the treaty-making power could do of itself that which the act proposed to foreign Governments. According to his construction, which gave to every part of the Constitution its full effect, and to every department of the Government the power granted to it, the reason was obvious; it was one of the subjects, the power over which had been granted to Congress; it was therefore necessary that Congress should act, as it ought always, in every such case; nor was there any just cause to apprehend a difficulty in making treaties under this construction; indeed, he thought the chairman of the committee (Mr. BABB) to whom the bill had been referred had satisfactorily shown, that, in practice, the construction he contended for had been adopted, and that no inconvenience had been discovered by experience. Suppose the Constitution to be of more doubtful construction than it really is, and the practice not settled, ought not that construction and that practice to be adopted which would best accord with its principles, and of course be best calculated to promote the general welfare; and would not such construction and such practice recommend the passing of the bill? The question is not however one of expediency, but whether the construction makes the bill necessary. It is my endeavor to show that it does. The construction contended for is warranted by that great principle which characterizes all the American Governments—that the majority shall govern; the ratification of a treaty by two-thirds of the Senate under the present Constitution, and by nine States under the old Confederation, as well as the provision for the adoption of the Constitution by nine States, he believed, were all bottomed on that principle. This he thought would satisfactorily appear by attending to the number of Representatives apportioned to the States. By the Convention which framed the present Constitution, the whole number was sixty-five, of which Massachusetts had eight, New York six, Pennsylvania eight, and Virginia ten; this supports the opinion advanced, that any nine States under the Confederation were supposed to contain a majority of the people; hence, under that Government it required nine of the thirteen States to ratify a treaty; and this also accounts for the two-thirds in the Senate. The fixing on this number was doubtless to secure the same principle when the new States should be admitted into the Union, and the few cases in which the House of Representatives were not to act; but not to alter or change the power granted to any department of the Government; certainly not to give the treaty-making power an authority over the revenue, because, from the rule by which Representatives was apportioned, and the admission of new States into the Union, it would readily have occurred that this might give the whole power delegated to the Government to a minority. Such an oversight will not be imputed to the Convention. In fact, if a treaty can do away a law, which it required Congress to pass, it follows, that a minority of the nation, by their Senators and the President, can undo that which a majority by their Representatives in every department of the Government had done. To be convinced of this, it is only necessary to attend to the rule by which Electors to vote for the President are apportioned among the States; and to the fact, that two-thirds of the States, the smallest certainly, have not a majority of the people. Any construction which gives this power to a minority, is a departure from the great American principle before stated, that a majority shall govern. Is it possible, Mr. President, that the wise and good men who formed the Constitution intended that a minority should govern, and that, too, by the treaty-making power?

Every Government treating with another, is supposed to understand the treaty-making power of the Government with which it treats, no matter where lodged, whether in the Executive alone, or in the Executive and Legislature jointly. In England, when the King, by treaty, promises to pay money, every Government in Europe knows that he cannot pay it without the consent of Parliament, and that he must apply to that body for it, whether an article be in the treaty or not for such application. So well established is the rule, and so well do Governments understand the power of each other, that France never complained after she had made treaties with the old Congress, in the year 1778, that Congress had no Constitutional authority to make or execute treaties. There was no doubt of the fact, because the articles of Confederation were not adopted by the States till the year 1781.

If in every case a treaty is law as soon as it is ratified by the President, the word law must have two different and distinct meanings in the Constitution, or money may be drawn from the Treasury by a treaty appropriation. The words are, no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law; not by acts of Congress or treaties, but law; and acts and treaties are both law. Then both may appropriate and both draw money from the Treasury; this construction gives the treaty-making power in the United States more authority than it has in England. The late treaty will prevent money from going into the Treasury; it might with as much propriety have drawn money out of it; if he was mistaken, the treaty-making power was only limited by the Constitution; it might treat on any and every power delegated to the General Government; it might make and execute a treaty of subsidy; in fact, it might put the nation in a state of war, which Congress alone have the power to declare; and according to treaty law, a part of the difficulty on this important and interesting question has no doubt been produced by an improper construction of that part of the Constitution which delegates power to Congress to declare war; under this power, Congress had passed a law to declare war, whereas, according to his understanding, it only required a statement made, after the manner of the civilized world, of the causes which produced the declaration; to a war thus declared, a Treaty of Peace properly put an end; there would be no law to prevent it.

Mr. Jefferson's letters, when Secretary of State, on the Treaty of Peace of 1783 with Great Britain, had been introduced to show that he understood that treaty to be the law of the land, and that it was so understood in the nation, and that under Mr. Jay's treaty the people at Detroit held land. With respect to the Treaty of 1783, it is only necessary to observe, that the old Congress had power to make treaties, but none to execute them; the execution depended entirely on the governments of the States, who did as they pleased. He thought no argument could be drawn from any fact connected with that treaty against the bill. The treaty of Mr. Jay, so far as it related to the people at Detroit, and everything which has since been done touching the boundary line, ought to be considered, as it certainly was, a continuation of the Treaty of Peace in the year 1783, with the intent to its full and fair execution. The people at Detroit were, at the time of that treaty, in the same situation that the people of the other parts of the nation were in the year 1783. The Whigs, with their property, remained in the United States, and the Tories, with theirs, left them. A foreigner holding land under Mr. Jay's treaty, held against State laws, and not against the laws of the United States. This is provided for in the Constitution; it has not, therefore, any bearing on the point in debate. The case of Louisiana has also been mentioned, with the intention to show the opinion of Mr. Jefferson and the then Congress; it was only necessary to add, to what had been said by the gentleman from Georgia, that whoever would be at the trouble to examine the Message of Mr. Jefferson, communicated to the House of Representatives with the treaty by which the country was acquired, will see the reason why both the acts noticed were not passed at the same time, and that he expressly calls for legislative aid to carry it into execution. A similar call was made in the case of the British Treaty finished under his Administration. It is confidently believed that neither of the cases show his or the opinion of Congress to be against the construction for which the friends of the bill contend; but, on the contrary, that both support it.

He agreed with the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. TAYLOR,) that ours is a Government of suspicion; every election proves it; the power to impeach proves it; the history of Cæsar, of Cromwell, and Bonaparte, proves that it ought to be so to remain free. He promised to be short, and would sit down.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Tennessee, said, this subject had assumed a degree of importance, from the course the debate had taken, to which, at first, it did not appear entitled. As he differed in opinion from some of the gentlemen who spoke on each side of the question, he deemed it a duty, though it had not been in his power, from a cause known to gentlemen, to give the subject that consideration to which it was entitled, to lay before the Senate a brief view of the grounds on which he should act.

It may be proper, said Mr. C., to inquire, in the first place, what the subject is on which we are called to legislate. A treaty has been made by the proper authorities, containing provisions relating to commerce, which affect your fiscal regulations, and may diminish your revenue; the Chief Magistrate of the nation, under whose instructions it was negotiated, and to whom is intrusted, by the Constitution, the "faithful execution" of the laws, lays it before you, and "recommends such legislative provisions as it may call for on the part of the United States." On the one side it is contended, that no legislative enactment is necessary; that the treaty is complete, and may be executed by the proper officers and tribunals of Government; and some have gone so far as to assert, that not only this, but every other treaty, constitutionally made, is complete without the aid of a law; and repeals all laws opposed to its provisions. On the other it is insisted, that this treaty cannot be executed without a law to carry its provisions into effect; and on this side some have contended, that no treaty affecting existing laws is complete without the sanction of a legislative act, at least repealing those laws opposed to its provisions. He could not, Mr. C. said, agree to the doctrine advocated on either side of this question, carried to the extent contended for. A fair construction of the several clauses of the Constitution, relating to this subject, would not, in his opinion, support it.

It may be proper here, said Mr. C., in order to a more distinct understanding of the question under discussion, to inquire:

1. What a treaty is, independent of the character given it by the Constitution? and,

2. What it becomes in virtue of that character?

1. A treaty, independent of the character given it by the Constitution, may be stated to be, a compact between two or more independent States, mutually binding on, and pledging the faith of each, for the performance of the stipulations it contains. The manner in which these stipulations shall be carried into effect, must depend on the nature of the governments of the respective States. If the Executive and Legislative powers are vested in the same person, as in the case of a despotic Government, the promulgation alone of the treaty may be considered as at once giving it all the binding force requisite to the full execution of its provisions; the fiat of the despot carrying with it Legislative as well as Executive sanction. In such a case, the power that negotiates a treaty executes it; and the question now before you cannot arise. But it is otherwise with Governments differently organized. Where the Legislative power is vested in a branch of the Government distinct from that exercising the Executive power, a treaty made by the latter requiring legislative provisions for its fulfilment, can only pledge the faith of the nation that its Legislature will enact the laws requisite for that purpose; and in such case it must rest on the will of the Legislature, whether the treaty shall be carried into effect or not. Thus, in England, no treaty, containing stipulations, materially affecting the interests of the nation, is carried into effect, without being laid before Parliament for its sanction, and for such legislative enactments as its provisions may require.

This difference, in the manner of executing the provisions of a treaty by different Governments, according to the organization of each, is not necessarily productive of any injurious consequences. At the time a treaty is formed, the nature of the Governments, parties to it, is known; and the confidence reposed in the fulfilment of its stipulations, must depend on the reliance placed in the national faith which is pledged by it. Each party agrees to it, with a distinct understanding, that its full execution depends upon the concurrence of the proper departments in each Government, in adopting the requisite legal provisions for carrying its stipulations into effect; and knowing at the same time, that if one party fails to execute its provisions, the others are no longer bound thereby. From this view of a treaty, considered independent of the Constitutional provision, it does not seem to possess the power ascribed to it, of repealing existing laws opposed to its provisions, or of going into operation in all cases, without the aid of legislative enactment.

He would next, Mr. C. said, inquire,

2. What a treaty became in virtue of the character given to it by the Constitution?

That instrument declares, that "all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the author-

SENATE.

'ity of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby; anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding."

On the one hand it is contended, (said Mr. C.,) that by this provision a treaty is made paramount to all existing laws of the United States, as well as to the laws and constitutions of the several States, and at once repeals, or at least removes out of its way, such as are opposed to its stipulations; on the other, that it is paramount only to the constitutions and laws of the respective States, and cannot, without the sanction of the National Legislature, control a law of the General Government.

I cannot, said Mr. C., agree with the arguments advanced on either side of this question, carried to their full extent. It would seem sufficiently clear that, by this provision, a treaty acquired the character of a law of the United States, at least for some purposes; and the only important inquiry appears to be, whether it does so for all purposes, and in regard to all subjects to which it may relate; and if not, for what purposes, and in regard to what subjects it acquires that character? The solution of this inquiry involves the giving a correct construction to the Constitutional provision in question. To enable us to do this, it will be necessary to refer to such other clauses of that instrument as relate to the same subject; and, by comparing them together, see how far they control or explain each other. For the same rules of construction that are adopted in regard to other instruments of the like kind, as statute laws, will equally apply to this; and it is believed that, by a due observance of these rules, most of the difficulties which have arisen in this discussion may be remedied. It is laid down as a rule that, in the construction of one part of a statute, every other part ought to be taken into consideration, and one part construed by another; also, that a statute should be so construed, that no clause, sentence, or word, should be superfluous or void; and further, the general words in one clause of a statute may be restrained by the particular words in a subsequent clause in the same statute. Apply those rules to the case before us. The first clause in the Constitution declares, "that all legislative powers therein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives." If this clause be considered alone, and unconnected with the subsequent provisions of that instrument, relating to the same subject, it would go a great way to support the doctrine contended for, that a law being considered the offspring of legislative power, can only emanate from the National Legislature, thus constituted the sole depository of all such powers. And an honorable gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. VARNUM) has, with considerable force, stated that, as by this provision of the Constitution, all legislative powers were vested in Congress, he could not perceive how any such power could be considered as vested in any other department of the Government, or how a treaty, made by the President and Senate alone, could be viewed as a law. But when we consider this clause in connexion with the subsequent provisions of that instrument, relating to the same subject, the force of this argument will be found to be greatly diminished, if not entirely done away. By one of those provisions it is declared, that "he (the President) shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties; provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur;" and by another, being that first referred to, such treaty, when so made, is declared to "be the supreme law of the land." Thus the President and Senate are, in express terms, authorized to make a treaty, which is pronounced, in terms equally clear, a law of the United States, on the same footing with the other laws, made pursuant to the Constitution. They must, therefore, be considered as vested with some portion of legislative power; and if so, the general expression, "all legislative powers," used in the first clause of the Constitution, cannot be construed according to the literal meaning of the words, but must be considered as restrained by the express terms of the subsequent provisions already referred to, and as only vesting those general powers, subject to the modifications thus imposed. This construction is supported by the rules already noticed, and will be further strengthened by another view which may be taken of the subject. If those several provisions were construed according to the literal import of the words used in each, they would be inconsistent with each other, and some of the expressions or words would become superfluous or void; but this is contrary to one of the clearest rules of construction, by which every clause, expression, and word, is, if possible, to have some meaning—some operative effect—and all to be reconciled and rendered consistent with each other. In the construction of instruments of this kind, we should likewise keep in view the particular subject to which each provision immediately relates; construe the words used with a particular reference to that subject, and endeavor to ascertain the intention of the makers, rather than be guided solely by the literal import of the words; and here the maxim, "qui herit in litera, heret in cortice," might well apply. The framers of the Constitution, when adopting the first clause, must have had in view the distribution of the general powers of the Government among the several departments thereof. That clause relates exclusively to Congress as the great depository of general legislative powers, and should be construed with a particular reference to the functions they are to perform. For the purposes of internal legislation, no doubt, all legislative powers are vested in them, in exclusion to the other departments of the Government. But it does not follow, as a necessary consequence, that those powers carried with them the authority to direct and control the management of our foreign relations. That subject was not then taken into view; it was considered in a subsequent part of the Constitution; and as it was supposed Congress could not consistently carry on our negotiations with foreign States, the power to do so was vested in the President and the Senate; and it does not appear that, for the mere purpose of making a treaty, any other department of the Government is necessarily to have any agency. There is no express provision in the Constitution to support the argument advanced by some, that a treaty is not complete, in any case, until sanctioned by the House of Representatives; and the inference is so far-fetched, resting on the ground already noticed, of all legislative powers being vested in Congress, that much argument cannot be necessary to refute it. For, if it be admitted, as already insisted on, that the provisions respecting the treaty-making power, and the effect of a treaty when made, control and modify the preceding provision, delegating the legislative powers (and no good reason can, it is believed, be shown for denying it) the conclusion would seem irresistible, that a treaty may be complete without the agency of the House of Representatives, and go into effect, as a law of the United States, without legislative enactment.

But, though it may be assumed, as sufficiently clear, that the President and Senate possess all the powers requisite to make a treaty complete, which may be carried into effect as a law without legislative aid, it is considered as equally clear, that their authority to do so extends to such cases only wherein the subjects to which it relates are clearly within the treaty-making power. For, when the framers of the Constitution delegated this power, they must have had in view those subjects only which properly belonged to it; and it cannot be supposed to have been their intention that it should be extended to such subjects as lay more properly within the sphere of the general legislative powers previously vested in Congress. The portion of legislative authority embraced in the treaty-making power, must be viewed as delegated for particular purposes only, and in its exercise limited to those purposes alone. Thus circumscribed in the range of its operations, there can be no ground to apprehend its encroaching on the functions of the National Legislature.

From this view of the subject, it results, as a necessary conclusion, that some treaties become complete, and go into effect as laws of the United States, without legislative aid, while others are incomplete without such aid, and only pledge the faith of the nation that the requisite legislative acts will be passed for carrying their provisions into effect. It would be difficult to designate all the cases in which a treaty would or would not require legislative aid to execute its provisions. To prescribe precise limits to the powers of the different departments of Government, would be an undertaking of the utmost difficulty, as well as of importance; and when attempted, the subject should be touched with a delicate hand. For, when the powers to be exercised by different authorities are in their nature the same, and separated by an ideal line only, depending on construction, and incapable of exact delineation, there will most generally be a certain intermediate space between them, which may be viewed as a kind of disputed ground, liable to be occupied alternately by the one or the other. To circumscribe this within as narrow limits as practicable, is a desirable object, and all that can be reasonably expected. Without, therefore, attempting to describe the precise line of demarcation between the legislative and treaty-making powers, the following positions may, it is believed, be assumed as generally correct: that when a treaty relates to such subjects only as are clearly embraced by the treaty-making power, and does not affect those expressly placed under the direction of the legislative department, it becomes, when duly ratified, a law of the United States, and may be executed by the proper tribunals without the aid of legislative enactment; but in all other cases, as where it relates to any subject placed under the peculiar direction of Congress, or which lies more properly within the sphere of legislative functions, or so far as it relates to any such subject, it does not become a law, nor go into effect without legislative aid, and can be considered in the nature of a compact only, pledging the national faith that the requisite legislative acts will be passed for carrying its provisions into effect. This view of the subject (Mr. C. said) he submitted with great deference; but he conceived that, by considering a treaty in this double character, the several provisions of the Constitution could be best reconciled, and the objects of its framers carried into more complete effect.

The argument advanced on this occasion, by some gentlemen, that a treaty is paramount to the constitutions and laws of the several States, but not on an equal footing with the legislative acts of the United States, is not supported by the words of the Constitution or the reason of the case. A treaty is declared to be "the supreme law of the land," in the same words that the Constitution itself, and the laws made in pursuance thereof, are declared to be so; and it is further declared that the judges in every State shall be bound thereby. When it becomes a law, it must be considered on the same footing as other laws of the United States. There cannot be different degrees of validity or of force in laws of the same Government. If the judges are bound, the courts must also be bound by it. What judges are bound by it? Can gentlemen mean that it is obligatory as a law on the judges and courts of the several States, but not on those of the United States; that it is sufficiently strong to bind them, but too weak to bind the other? This argument is not supported by reason, nor sanctioned by precedent, and would make the Constitution speak a language unintelligible. When a treaty becomes a law, it is equally binding on the judges and courts of the United States as on those of the several States; and, whether it acquires that character or not, must depend on the subjects to which it relates, and on the tribunals called on to execute it. This will be further confirmed by recurring to some other provisions of the Constitution. It is declared that "no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law." It may, therefore, be drawn from it by virtue of a law; and if a treaty were a law for all purposes, and in regard to all subjects to which it might relate, money might be drawn from the Treasury by virtue of a treaty purporting to make appropriations. This, however, has not hitherto been contended for, and it is presumed never will, until the Government is ready to crumble into ruins, and the people prepared to wear the shackles of slavery.

By another provision in the Constitution, power is given to Congress "to lay and collect taxes, duties," &c., "to declare war, to raise and support armies," &c. These objects are all effected by law, but no one pretends they could be by treaty. It may be said the power to regulate commerce is also given to Congress; and it is a subject to which it must be admitted the treaty-making power extends. This is true; but regulations made by them in regard to this subject, can operate only within our own limits, and on our own citizens abroad. Other States are not bound by them; and when their assent is necessary to any proposed regulations, it can be regularly obtained only through the medium of the treaty-making power. This is, therefore, perfectly reconcilable with the construction of the other provisions contended for.

This view of the subject will also be found to be supported by former usage, as well as precedents in similar cases. Many instances had occurred, as could be shown from your statute book, of treaties relative to subjects only properly within the treaty-making power, or so far as they relate to such subjects, going into operation without the aid of legislative enactment. To some of these, Mr. C. said, he would refer. The treaty made with Spain in 1795, establishing the southern boundary line of the United States, and containing other important provisions, was carried into execution by Executive authority, except the 10th article, which related to duties, (and will hereafter be noticed,) without the aid of legislative enactment. The treaty with France of 1803, for the cession of Louisiana, was also executed by Executive authority, except so far as it related to duties and internal regulations, &c., and possession of the ceded country taken, without legislative aid. In addition to these he would mention, as a precedent in point, the late Treaty of Peace with Great Britain, which had been fully executed, and no one had suggested the necessity of legislative aid for the purpose. A number of treaties with the Indian tribes had, during the present session, as well as on former occasions, gone into operation in like manner; and many other instances, equally strong, might be adduced; but those referred to were deemed sufficient for the present purpose.

On the other hand it would appear, Mr. C. said, that when a treaty related to subjects properly belonging to the legislative department, or placed by the Constitution under its immediate direction, or so far as it related to such subjects, legislative enactment had been deemed necessary to carry its provisions into effect. To establish this, it would be sufficient to refer to a few cases, though many others existed and could be adduced. In the treaty with Great Britain of 1795, already referred to, the 3d article regulates the commercial intercourse between the citizens and subjects of the two contracting parties residing on each side of our Northwestern boundary line, and establishes the duties that shall be demandable. By the act passed in 1799, this intercourse, and the duties to be collected according to said article, were regulated. By the 7th article of the treaty of 1803 with France, already referred to, the vessels of France and Spain, laden with the productions of their respective countries, to be admitted for twelve years into the ports of the ceded territory in the same manner as vessels of the United States, &c. This was a parallel case with the present; it related to duties—it might affect the revenue. In 1804, a law was passed for carrying this provision into effect. Some difficulties arising in regard to the execution of the 10th article of the treaty of 1795, with Spain, before referred to, an act was passed in 1805, for the avowed purpose of carrying into complete effect the provisions of that article. Without pursuing this inquiry further, the instances adduced, Mr. C. said, appeared to him sufficient to support the construction contended for, so far as usage and precedent could have that effect.

What then, inquired Mr. C., is the case before you? By this treaty the discriminating duties are to be abolished; the additional duty on the tonnage of foreign vessels, as well as on the goods imported in such vessels, is no longer to exist. This may affect, may diminish your revenue, and render necessary the imposition of new taxes to support the public credit, and maintain the national faith. Should not then the other House, immediate representatives of the people, exclusively intrusted with originating revenue bills, be allowed to act on the subject? Another consideration would seem entitled to particular attention on the present occasion. The President, who had the chief agency in making this treaty, and whose duty it is to see that it be duly executed, has laid it before Congress in order to obtain the legislative aid requisite for carrying its provisions into effect. His opinion, therefore, coincides with that of the other House as to the necessity of such aid; the policy and importance of its being executed without delay, are by all admitted. Why then refuse your assent to a measure called on for this purpose by the other two branches of the Legislature, and which, if even unnecessary, must prove harmless?

It has however been said, your Executive officers and tribunals of justice, are competent to execute the provisions of this treaty. Do gentlemen consider the collectors of the revenue, and other officers of Government, better qualified to decide a Constitutional question—to determine the effect of a treaty, than the President, the House of Representatives, and this body? Can it be a correct course of legislation to require these officers to decide a question of such difficulty, and on which the great departments of Government are so much divided? And is not this circumstance itself sufficient ground to legislate on the subject, that your public functionaries may have some unerring guide to direct their conduct? But it has been alleged this would be sanctioning an encroachment on the powers of the Senate, a violation of the Constitution, which we are bound to support. If the measure appeared to him in this light, he would, Mr. C. said, unite with gentlemen in opposing it. He admitted each department should move within the sphere assigned it. He had, however, heard no argument that convinced him this would be a violation of the Constitution; and he was unable to perceive how it could be so considered.

He did not consider the power of the Senate in making treaties so important—so transcendent, as they had been represented. How is a treaty negotiated? (said Mr. C.) The instructions for the purpose are given by the President, without consulting this body, (not being required to do so by the Constitution;) the treaty is formed without your knowledge; and the only agency you have in the business, is, when laid before you for ratification, to disapprove or approve its provisions, with or without amendment, and advise accordingly, amounting to little more than a mere negative. Is there anything in this to justify the Senate in considering a treaty so peculiarly its own offspring, as in no case to allow the other House any agency in having its provisions carried into effect?

It may here be asked whether it be competent to the House of Representatives, in cases requiring legislative aid for executing the provisions of a treaty, to decide on the policy of such treaty; and in case of disapproving it, prevent its going into effect by refusing the aid required? This is a question which once agitated the great political parties in this country, but which it may not be necessary to discuss on the present occasion, as no difference of opinion appears to exist respecting the policy of carrying this treaty into effect. As the subject, however, had been referred to, he would (Mr. C. said) very briefly state the view in which it appeared to him. When a treaty is concluded requiring legislative aid to execute its provisions, the House of Representatives is undoubtedly bound to afford that aid by all the obligations which the pledged faith of the nation can impose, as well as by the considerations arising from the importance to the national character of having the public faith, so pledged, preserved inviolate; but, on the other hand, the members of that body must take into consideration the Constitution under which they act, and which they are bound to support; the great interests of the nation, and how far they may be affected by the treaty in question; and weighing all these considerations, must have the right, subject only to the responsibility they impose, to act as free agents, to exercise their free will, and grant or refuse the aid required according to the best judgment, guided by a single view to the public good, they are able to form on the subject. If their assent be necessary to give effect to, and execute a treaty, they must have the power, the right to grant or refuse that assent. If they have no right in any case to deliberate on the laws requisite to execute a treaty, they can no longer be viewed as the representatives of a free people, delegated to express their will, or as the guardians of their rights, but only as the instruments of the treaty-making power, the mere registers of its edicts. But is there any danger to be apprehended to the Government, to the public interest, from the view which has been taken of this subject? Is it not consistent with the plan, the spirit of the Constitution, which makes the different departments of Government operate as checks on the conduct of each other, and thus guard against a dangerous preponderance being acquired by either?

Some gentlemen seem to consider the Senate as the peculiar guardian of the Constitution, the shield of the Government against the innovating spirit of the popular branch. On what ground is this claim set up? On that of its superior stability, arising from its permanent character, the longer term of service of its members, and deriving their authority from the State Legislatures instead of immediately from the people. He conceived (Mr. C. said) more importance was attached to these circumstances, than they would, on examination, be found to possess. From the nature of its organization, and the limited number of which it consisted, the changes it underwent would be found nearly, if not quite equal to those that occurred in the other House; and as to the mode in which its members were chosen, there was but one step between them and the people, and that did not, in his opinion, much diminish their dependence on them. The members of the Legislature being elected by the people, and immediately responsible to them, would generally, in choosing a Senator, consult their will, and be governed as much thereby in this, as in other acts of their political conduct. Though, therefore, this body, in its organization, partook of the federative character, and thereby tended to equalize the relative weight of the States in the National Legislature, yet, deriving its origin in part, in the manner just stated, from the will of the people, it was substantially dependent on them as well as the other House. And why should it not? This is a Government formed by the people, (not by the States, as such,) deriving all its authority from them, and having no existence separate from their will; consisting only of a few of themselves selected for a time to guide the vessel of State, in which all are equally embarked; and having performed the duties assigned them, retiring again into the walks of private life, to mingle with their fellow-citizens, from whom they had emerged by the mere force of public opinion. While, therefore, on the one hand, there appeared no sufficient reason for the apprehended encroachments on the privileges of the other House, and the rights of the people, by the treaty-making power, on the other, he could not perceive any ground to justify the dangers apprehended for the stability of the Government from encroachments by the other House on the Constitutional powers of this.

SENATE.

The safety, however, of the Constitution, and of public liberty, (said Mr. C.) rests on foundations more solid than the permanent character and stability of this, or the political honesty of the other House; it rests on the sound sense, intelligence, and public virtue of the people. So long as these remain in their full vigor, so long will liberty triumph over all attempts to subvert it; but should the people become enervated, ignorant, and corrupt, from the very organization of your Government not only the members of the Legislature, but your Executive and other officers, and all engaged in the management of public affairs, if they do not lead the way in, must partake of the same degeneracy, and the subversion of liberty, the decline and final ruin of the Republic, inevitably follow.

When Mr. CAMPBELL had concluded—

On motion, by Mr. ROBERTS, it was agreed to take the question by yeas and nays. And then the Senate adjourned.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The accompanying extract from the occurrences at Fort Jackson, in August, 1814, during the negotiation of a treaty with the Indians, shows that the friendly Creeks, wishing to give to General Jackson, Benjamin Hawkins, and others, a national mark of their gratitude and regard, conveyed to them, respectively, a donation of land, with a request that the grant might be duly confirmed by the Government of the United States.

Taking into consideration the peculiar circumstances of the case—the expediency of indulging the Indians in wishes which they associated with the treaty signed by them, and that the case involves an inviting opportunity for bestowing on an officer, who has rendered such illustrious services to his country, a token of its sensibility to them—the inducement to which cannot be diminished by the delicacy and disinterestedness of his proposal to transfer the benefit from himself: I recommend to Congress that provision be made for carrying into effect the wishes and request of the Indians, as expressed by them. J. MADISON.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. MORROW, from the committee appointed on so much of the Message of the President of the United States, as relates to roads and canals, made a report in part, which was read, together with a bill, making appropriation for the construction of roads and canals; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

The report and bill are as follows:

That a view of the extent of territory, the number and magnitude of navigable lakes, rivers, and bays; the variety of climate, and consequent diversity of productions embraced by the United States, cannot fail to impose the conviction, that a capacity exists in this country to maintain an extensive internal commerce. The variety of productions peculiar to the several parts, invites to the prosecution of a commerce of the most interesting kind. A commerce internal, subject solely to the regulations of the country, not dependent on, or materially affected by the vicissitudes of foreign competition or collisions; the profits on which will rest in the country, and make an addition to the wealth of the nation. Such a commerce will, in its natural tendency, create interests and feelings, consonant with the great interests of the community. Any practicable scheme, therefore, for improvement of roads and inland navigation, having for its object the encouragement and extension of a commerce so beneficial, has strong claims to the attention and aid of Government, constituted to promote the general welfare.

Such improvements, executed on an extensive scale, would unquestionably contribute to the general interest and increase of wealth in the nation, for, whatever tends to accelerate the progress of industry, in its various and particular branches, or to remove the obstacles to its full exertion, must, in the result, produce that effect. The contemplated improvement in roads and canals, by extending the communication for commercial and personal intercourse, to the interior and distant parts of the Union, would bestow common benefits, and give an enlarged faculty to the great branches of national industry, whether agricultural, commercial, or manufacturing.

The agricultural products, which at present, from inconvenient distance, their weight, or bulk, are unportable, could then be carried to a distant market; the reduction on the charge for transportation would become an addition to the price; and a ready market, and increased price, enhance the value of the lands from which the products were drawn.

The general commerce of the country would thereby receive a proportional advantage from the increase of the quantity of articles for exportation, the facility and extension to the vending of imported commodities, as also from a more general consumption arising from an increased ability in the community to purchase such commodities. To manufacturers a reduction on the charge for transportation of the raw material, and wrought commodity, would be highly beneficial. The beneficial effects on individual interests, and the general wealth in society, arising from a system of cheap conveyance, by artificial roads and canals, does not rest on speculative opinion or abstract reasonings for confirmation; all doubts as to the advantages, have been removed by the test of experience in every country, where such improvements have been executed on a liberal scale.

To insure to the pursuits of useful industry in a nation, a state of the greatest prosperity, it is only necessary to protect their interests from foreign aggression, to leave them unrestrained by artificial provisions, and to remove, or ameliorate, the natural obstacles to their exertion, by public works, rendering conveyance practicable and cheap.

Such public works, while they are calculated to subserve the pecuniary interests of every industrious class of the community, are highly important in a political point of view. The citizens, in the most remote parts, would be brought into close connexion, by a facility to commercial and personal intercourse. The common interests and identity of feelings thence arising, would, as a cement to the parts, bind together the whole, with the strong bond of interest and affection, giving stability and perpetuity to the Union; and, as a means of security, tend to increase our capacity for resistance to foreign aggressions, by rendering less expensive, and more effective, our military operations. The disadvantages experienced and heavy charges incurred during the late war, for want of inland navigation along the seacoast, connecting the great points of defence, are of too recent date, and decisive a character, to require any other demonstration that a facility in inland communication constitutes a principal means of national defence.

It is believed that improvements so important to the political and general interest of society, stand strongly recommended to the attention of the National Legislature. The General Government alone possess the means and resources to give direction to works calculated for general advantage, and to insure their complete execution.

The particular objects of this kind, to which public aid should be given, the means to be employed, and the mode of applying the public moneys remain to be considered.

The objects are, such artificial roads and canals as are practicable of execution, and which promise a general or extensive advantage to the community; others, of minor importance, that are local in their nature, and will produce only local benefits, will, more properly, be left for execution to the means and enterprise of individuals, or to the exertions of particular States. It is, indeed, a political maxim, well attested by experience, that wherever private interests are competent to the provision and application of their own instruments and means, such provision and means should be left to themselves.

The great works which are calculated for national advantage, either in a military or commercial view, their execution must depend (at least for aid) on the General Government. Wherever great obstacles are to be overcome, great power and means must be employed. To such works the means of associated individuals are incompetent, and the particular States may not have a sufficient interest in the execution of works of the most essential advantage to other parts of the community. In other cases, where interest might be sufficiently operative, the means or the power may not be possessed, their territorial jurisdiction being limited short of the whole extent of the work.

Among many other objects of improvement in inland navigation and roads, coming within the above description, the following appears to be recommended by their importance to the attention of Congress: 1st. Canals opening an inland navigation along the Atlantic seacoast. 2d. A great turnpike road from North to South. 3d. Turnpike roads forming communications between the Atlantic and Western rivers. 4th. Military roads communicating with the frontier posts; and, 5th. A canal around the Falls of Ohio, or opening the bed of the river at that place.

The present state of the national finances, and the effect which engaging in many expensive works at the same time would produce, in raising the price of labor, seems to point out the policy of applying the public means to one, or only a few of these objects, in the first instance.

The difficulty and delicacy of selecting a particular object from among many others of acknowledged importance and great interest, is sensibly felt. In making the decision, general interests must be kept in view, and be held superior to local considerations. It appears proper, that when the Government authorize the expenditure and application of public moneys, to one of these objects, they should at the same time adopt a system, calculated to insure, in due time, the execution of other works requiring their aid.

After due consideration, and that examination which the committee have been able to give to the subject, they respectfully recommend to the first attention of Congress, "the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal," being in their opinion of the first importance, and requiring the aid of the General Government. It forms the central link in that great chain of inland navigation along the seacoast, proposed to be opened. It is believed, from the best evidence, to be practicable of execution, and of itself, unconnected with other improvements, will afford the most extensive advantages. On this the committee will make a special report.

Of the different modes which might be devised of applying public moneys to objects of internal improvements, that of authorizing subscriptions for a limited number of shares of the stock of companies incorporated for the purpose, appears, on every consideration, to be the most eligible. By limiting the number of shares to be subscribed, to a third, or less than one half, of the whole stock, there is more security that the Government shall not become engaged in impracticable projects for improvements, and also for the economical expenditure of the funds, than would be, on the plan of a direct application by Government, of the public moneys.

The committee, in order to ascertain what funds may be made applicable to the objects of internal improvement, with due regard to the state of the finances, and demands on the Treasury, requested information from the Treasury Department. The information obtained accompanies this report. It will be observed that the surplus revenue applicable to these objects is hypothetically stated in the Secretary's letter, as necessarily it must be, in the present state of the revenue laws.

It appears, however, under any contemplated change in the existing system, that the revenue would be sufficient to supply, after the present year, and during a state of peace, an annual appropriation of $600,000 for the purpose of internal improvement. That sum would constitute a fund capable of effecting many valuable objects of that kind; and, under prosperous circumstances, the fund might be gradually argued in the proportion of the decrease of the public debt. But, if it shall enter into the policy of Government to authorize expenditures in execution of the works calculated for public advantage and general convenience, the same policy will direct to the provision of the means. For it cannot be doubted that the resources of the nation are amply sufficient, when brought in aid of private means, to effect every object of improvement on roads and canals, that are of an extensive nature, and of national concern.

The committee respectfully propose, that an annual appropriation be made, to constitute a fund for making roads and opening canals; that the fund shall be under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall, whenever authorized by Congress, subscribe for shares in the stock of companies incorporated for making artificial roads or opening canals, and shall pay out of the aforesaid fund the instalments as they become due on such shares; that any dividends thence arising, when any work shall be completed, shall be paid into and become a part of said fund, and the Secretary shall report, at each session, to Congress, all expenditures, and the general state of the fund, as well as the state of the works in which the Government are concerned.

The committee have directed a bill to be reported embracing the above provisions.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the annual sum of — dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for the purpose of constituting a fund, for making artificial roads, and opening canals; which annual sum shall be set apart, and invariably pledged, as a fund for the purpose aforesaid, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever; and the same shall be placed, and held under the special charge and direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, for the time being: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent Congress from suspending this appropriation during a state of war with any foreign Power, in which the United States may be engaged.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That whenever Congress shall, by law, authorize subscription to be made for shares of the stock of any company incorporated, for making artificial roads or canals, and a subscription conformable thereto shall have been made on behalf of the United States, all moneys which shall become due according to the provisions of such acts, on the shares of stock holden by the United States, shall be paid out of the aforesaid fund.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That all dividends or profits which shall accrue from the shares of stock holden by the United States, shall be received by the said Secretary, and shall by him be paid into the said fund, and become a part thereof.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the further duty of the said Secretary, to make to Congress, at each session, a report on the state of the said fund, with the expenditures and receipts, together with the state of the work on all roads and canals, in the construction of which the United States have become concerned in the manner aforesaid.

CHESAPEAKE AND DELAWARE CANAL.

Mr. MORROW, from the same committee, made the following report, in part, together with a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to subscribe, in behalf of the United States, for — shares in the capital stock of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company; and the bill was read and passed to a second reading.

The committee, to whom was referred so much of the President's Message as relates to roads and canals, having, in their general report, recommended to Congress the Chesapeake and Delaware canal as an object of first importance requiring the aid of the General Government, beg leave to make a separate report concerning the same.

The Chesapeake and Delaware canal, as an object of high national importance, has for many years claimed the attention of Congress. It was first presented to their consideration in the year 1806, by a memorial of the president and directors, dated the 1st of December, 1805; and, by a report subsequently made, on the 21st of March, 1806, it appears that an enlightened committee of the Senate recommended that aid should be granted to the memorialists. The report of this committee was finally adopted, and one or more bills passed the Senate authorizing a grant of land to the company, not exceeding two hundred thousand acres, to be exchanged for the stock of the company. These bills, however, were postponed by the House of Representatives, owing, it is believed, to the peculiar embarrassments of the country at the periods they were sent for concurrence.

In June, 1813, the subject of the Chesapeake and Delaware canal was again brought forward before the Senate, and, on the 12th of July, a committee reported that it would not be expedient to act upon the subject at so late a period of the session, but at the time earnestly recommended it to the early and attentive consideration of the Senate at the next meeting of Congress. But then, unfortunately, the war and the financial embarrassments of the country forbade an attempt to revive the subject. Now, however, all the pre-existing obstacles would seem to be happily removed, and the present moment appears to your committee highly auspicious for Congress to interpose, and to grant its prompt and efficient aid to the company.

For a full and able exposition of the history of the Chesapeake and Delaware canal, of its utility, of its practicable and easy execution, of the progress and state of the work, of the probable expense, and of the causes which compelled the company to suspend their operations, your committee beg leave to refer the Senate to the said memorial of the president and directors, with their observations accompanying the same; to the report of the Senate, made thereupon, of the 21st of March, 1806, and also to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on roads and canals, made in pursuance of a resolution of the Senate of the 2d of March, 1807; and pray that the same may be taken as a part of this their report.

After this general reference, your committee deem it unnecessary to go into a full discussion of the merits and utility of the Chesapeake and Delaware canal. They will, however, glance at one or two of the most important considerations.

The Chesapeake and Delaware canal may with justice be considered as of first-rate importance in the great proposed line of inland navigation along the Atlantic seaboard from North to South, and its execution as assuring the opening of that great communication at no very distant period.

It embraces within itself a wide extended range of interests from North Carolina, including all the towns and landings on the rivers and waters of that State, emptying into the Albemarle and Pamlico sounds, as well as that of the numerous rivers of Virginia and Maryland, which empty into the Chesapeake Bay, for a distance of six hundred miles, to Trenton, on the Delaware.

But this is not the most interesting view of this subject. The Chesapeake and Delaware canal is especially calculated to subserve and promote the great interests of the nation. As a military work, it offers facilities of the highest importance.

From the extent and exposure of the Atlantic States to an enemy possessed of a naval superiority, how important is it to have an interior navigation along and near the frontier, which will admit of the transportation of an army, with its artillery, &c., in safety, from point to point, with a celerity of movement equal to that of the enemy.

During the Revolutionary war, it is stated that General WASHINGTON often lamented the want of a navigable canal from the Chesapeake to the Delaware. His supplies for the most part were drawn from the Chesapeake, and the difficulties he experienced in procuring the means for transporting them across the isthmus are said to have been inconceivably great.

But what he most lamented was the dangerous and vexatious detention to which he was inevitably subjected, when he arrived at the isthmus on his march to the South, for the want of wagons to transport his stores and heavy artillery from one bay to the other. This detention, at a juncture so critical, under circumstances less favorable, might have proved fatal to him and to his army.

The inconveniences felt and incalculable expense incurred by individuals as well as the public, during the late war, in the vast and heavy transportations across the isthmus, must be fresh in the recollection of every one. So great was the carriage, during this period, of goods, tobacco, flour, cotton, and other bulky articles across the peninsula, that it became necessary to use four distinct lines of transportation from different points of the Chesapeake to corresponding points of the Delaware, at an expense of wagonage estimated for one year at not less than four hundred and fourteen thousand dollars, nearly one-half of the estimated cost of the canal.

The committee further remark that, if it is at any time to enter into the liberal policy of Congress to aid the Chesapeake and Delaware canal, there are reasons in reference to the particular state of the work itself why that aid should be speedily afforded.

For the want of funds the operations of the company have stood suspended for ten years and upwards; and that important and difficult part of the work, the feeder, (nearly completed,) with its several embankments, culverts, and bridges, is exposed to daily injury, and in danger of great dilapidation, if not ruin. Besides, the company not having been able to comply with certain contracts for lands and water rights for the use of the canal, suits have been brought and judgments obtained by the proprietors against them; so that the lands and water rights so purchased are in danger of being sold, and the money actually paid in part for said lands and water rights, amounting to large sums, is in danger of being actually lost.

One other remark the committee have deemed worthy of notice. The Chesapeake and Delaware canal necessarily passes through the extremities of two States, without being so central to either as to command the general interests of either government. Its peculiar local situation would, therefore seem to recommend it to the aid and patronage of the General Government, especially in connexion with its acknowledged local and general utility.

The whole expense of the canal is estimated at	$850,000
Of which has been paid by the stockholders, and expended on the work	100,000
Yet wanted to complete the canal	750,000
To raise this sum, the committee propose that Congress should authorize a subscription for 2,000 shares of the stock of the company, at $200 per share, making	$400,000
There remains to be paid in, on the stock subscribed and not forfeited	100,000 — 500,000
Leaving a deficit of	$250,000 which, it is presumed, will be made up by additional individual and other subscriptions.

In fixing upon the sum of $400,000, the committee have had regard to the embarrassments of the company, the magnitude of the work, and the disposition heretofore manifested by the Senate to grant lands to the company equal in value to the sum now proposed.

Upon due consideration, the committee are of opinion that the sum of $400,000 ought to be appropriated, to be applied by way of subscription for the stock of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company, and have accordingly submitted a bill with this report for that purpose.

Observations respecting the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal.

The Committee of the President and Directors of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company, appointed to present their memorial, and solicit the aid and patronage of Congress, beg leave respectfully to offer to the members of the Senate and House of Representatives the following facts and observations relative to the said canal, as the ground and reasons for their application:

The utility of canals in every country where they have been introduced is proved by the example of so many great nations, both ancient and modern, that at this period it seems almost unnecessary to enter into an investigation of their general utility, or of their history. In order, however, to show their application to the United States with more force, and to prove the greatness of their importance, a short sketch of their introduction, and subsequent improvement by many distinguished nations, may revive the recollection of the members to numerous facts and principles which must have occurred to them in their general studies.

At a very early period of society, the Egyptians bestowed immense advantages on their country by the canals they executed along the river Nile, and from the Mediterranean to the Red Sea, through the isthmus of Suez, by which means the commerce of India and all the maritime parts of Asia was opened to Europe and the countries communicating with the Mediterranean, and was the source of all their great improvements in the arts and power. The accounts of several modern travellers, and particularly the researches of the French and British, who lately visited that country, afford ample testimony of the existence, operation, and advantages of these canals.

From sources no less authentic, and particularly from the late embassy of Lord Macartney, we learn the immense extent and utility of the canals of China, which bring the products of that vast Empire from its most distant provinces, interchange those of one region and climate with another, and establish a profound system of political economy through the country.

The Greeks and Romans attempted to intersect the Isthmus of Corinth, and several other important passes; but, partly from their ignorance of lock navigation, and partly from their genius being less devoted to commerce and manufactures than to war and the luxury of the fine arts, few works of this kind remain in the countries they governed.

No sooner, however, had the spirit of commerce revived, after the barbarous ages, than the nations of Europe began extensive works of this kind; since which, the improvement of those works has continually increased with the civilization of the countries which have adopted them, and has been the chief means of introducing and nourishing their commerce, their manufactures, and those useful arts which have changed the condition of mankind, and promoted the happiness of the people more than all other circumstances.

Some of the first modern canals were undertaken and executed by the free republics of Italy, where lock navigation, which forms an important era in the history of canals, was first used.

France, under her ancient Kings, early engaged in enterprises of so much value to the nation; Henry IV. constructed the canal of Briare, and designed many others, which have since been executed. Louis XIV. began and completed the great canal of Languedoc, which, extending from the Mediterranean to Toulouse, opened the communication from that sea to the Bay of Biscay, and has at once furnished incalculable advantages, by saving a circuit of near two thousand miles of sea navigation, and established a monument of his greatness more durable than all the other transactions of his reign; succeeding Kings, in the same manner, added numerous works of the kind; and the nation, both while a Republic and under its present Emperor, amidst all the wars and calamities it has suffered, has unceasingly devoted itself to the construction of canals.

In Holland and Flanders, still more attention has been bestowed to this important subject. The former nation may, indeed, be said to owe its political origin and existence to canals, since they not only drain the country, but intersect it so much in every direction as to form the universal means of communication.

In Flanders so numerous are canals, that few of its cities are without them; and the admirable agriculture and manufactures of those provinces have been formed and brought to maturity by the aid which water conveyance affords them.

But the island of Great Britain furnishes a proof of the advantages of canals beyond any other country. That nation has now become the maritime rival, and almost the controller, of every commercial people; her superiority has arisen from her unbounded commerce, and the vast wealth it has introduced, the basis of which wealth is her immense manufactures, which supply the wants of a large portion of the earth; the foundation of these manufactures has again been formed by her internal improvements, and particularly her canals, which, since their introduction by the Duke of Bridgewater, scarce fifty years ago, have been so rapidly extended as to traverse the kingdom in every direction. By these means her mines of coal, iron, limestone, and every other raw material, have been opened and dispersed for the purpose of manufacture; while the products of agriculture have been conveyed from province to province, and the demands of one place supplied the resources of another; hence, by her immense inland navigation, universal industry and employment have been everywhere diffused; first, to supply her own wants, and, secondly, to furnish a vast supply for export, to obtain the wealth of other countries.

The United States, both from their present political and natural situation, demand from their Government every aid it can furnish, which renders it dubious whether there is any object which can more highly merit the attention of their rulers. Their soil and the industry of the people have, in a few years, carried their agriculture to an immense extent; and their enterprise has created, with the means it furnishes, a commerce which now vies with the oldest nations of Europe. But her rapid increase in prosperity has already drawn upon her the envy, the jealousy, and the hostility of other nations, which alone can be counteracted by improving her internal strength, supplying her wants, as far as possible, by her own produce and manufactures, and extending her agriculture, so as to gain from its surplus the wealth of other nations, and furnish her own Government with the support it may require in every exigency.

For all these purposes her want of population, and the allurements held out by her unsettled territory, form the only obstacle. The price of labor retards her agricultural improvements, and prevents the more rapid increase of her manufactures; and the difficulty of communication from one part of her territory to another, adds immensely to these disadvantages. It must be obvious, therefore, that whatever mechanical or other arts can lessen or supply the want of manual labor, or whatever improvements can accelerate internal communication, are of infinitely more importance in the present situation of the country than at a future one, and form at this moment the fairest objects for private exertion and public encouragement.

It is only necessary to examine the produce of the different States, to be convinced how much that produce may be so disposed as to form an incalculable increase of internal resource and foreign wealth.

The Southern States furnish abundance of materials, which, if cheaply conveyed to the Middle and Northern States, would encourage manufactures. Coal, which is the basis of almost every manufacture, abounds on the navigable waters of James river, in Virginia, and is wanted not only in the maritime cities, and along the whole seacoast, but in those interior situations where means exist for forming mills and waterworks; wheat, flour, and corn, are produced in the Middle States, and wanted both to the southward and eastward; tobacco is the growth only of a few States, and is wanted in the rest; fish, oil, lumber, and a variety of other articles, are produced to the northward, and are all in demand to the southward; in the interior of all the States there are vast quantities of limestone, iron, copper, lead, and other materials, which are accessible to navigation, and will not bear a carriage by land, but which may be universally diffused by means of interior canals, uniting with a general one through the Union.

The advantages, and indeed the necessity of canals, may be proved by a few simple facts. A ton of goods, by weight or measurement, (of forty cubic feet,) is frequently brought from Europe, a distance of three thousand miles, for forty shillings sterling, or about nine dollars; this rate admits of salt, coal, stone, lumber, and the most bulky articles, being imported from beyond the seas cheaper than they can be conveyed for a very short distance by land, since a ton of goods cannot be carried on good roads for the same price more than thirty miles. Hence the charges of conveyance through the United States are very great, even for fine and valuable articles; but on the bulky products of agriculture, and on mineral productions, they operate as a total exclusion. In England, wherever coal is discovered, it immediately becomes the basis of manufactures, as the materials to be worked into use; such as iron, copper, clay for earthenware, glass, &c., are either conveyed to it, or the coal itself is brought to the places where these articles abound; this can only be effected by canals. A coal mine may, therefore, exist in the United States not more than ten miles from valuable ores of iron and other materials, and both of them be useless until a canal is established between them, as the price of land carriage is too great to be borne by either.

Chesapeake and Delaware Canal.

SENATE.

Nor does the conveyance of produce coastwise by sea lessen the expense in any manner proportioned to that of canals, or even of foreign vessels, for which the following reasons may be assigned: first, the coasting trade is chiefly carried on in vessels which take their produce from, and deliver it into, small ports; these vessels are therefore generally small, and are navigated at a far greater expense in proportion than large vessels; secondly, the danger of coasting voyages is greater, which proportionably increases the risk and prices of insurance; thirdly, the delays of delivery, accident, &c., port charges, repairs, and other expenses, are accumulated on small vessels. Hence goods are frequently brought from Europe nearly as low as they can be conveyed by sea from Baltimore to Philadelphia—cities which by land are not more than one hundred miles from each other. This is remarkably the case with respect to coal, which is brought into most of our maritime cities from Liverpool, and sold as cheap as it can be brought to them from James river, which is not one-sixth of the distance.

But canals obviate all these inconveniences; they avoid the risk of a stormy coasting navigation, and render the charge of insurance little or nothing; they reduce the number of hands employed in conveyance, as upon the canals themselves one horse saves the labor of many men; and where river navigation is connected with them, their superior safety and ease require in no degree the expense of coasting vessels; the navigation is also never impeded by winds or tides, but vessels pass on at all times with entire certainty, except from frosts alone; and the arrival of produce to a market may be calculated on with a great degree of exactness; all which circumstances far overbalance the tolls which are paid upon them. By proceeding through the country, also, they open a variety of markets, both for the sale of their produce, and to obtain some other in return. A vessel, for instance, loaded with produce in the Chesapeake bay, would have the advantage of calling at Baltimore, or of proceeding directly on through Delaware to Philadelphia, and from thence to New York, Albany, or Boston, in a direct course, with a choice of all these markets, and the certainty of providing, at some of these, articles in return; a kind of voyage which it would be nearly impossible to perform coastwise.

Upon a survey of any map of the United States, it will appear that the distance from the head of Chesapeake bay, round by sea, to Philadelphia, is nearly five hundred miles, which is saved by a canal of twenty-one miles; the distance again from Trenton, on the Delaware, to New York, or Brunswick, on the Raritan, is near three hundred miles, and will be saved by a canal of twenty-seven miles: such is the saving in point of distance. With respect to time, it may be reckoned as follows:

From New York to Brunswick is a customary passage of one tide	7 hours.
From Brunswick to Trenton, by a canal,
at the rate of four miles an hour, is	7 "
From Trenton to Philadelphia, is	10 "

This voyage is performed in this time nearly with certainty, whereas coastwise it requires a week, and often longer.

The passage from Philadelphia to the mouth of the intended canal, near Wilmington, is 12 hours.

From thence to the end of the canal	5 hours.
From the end of the canal, on Elk river, according to the usual time of the packet boats, to Baltimore	9 "

This voyage requires, on an average, from a week to ten days by sea; indeed, the inconvenience is so great that it is rarely attempted.

Other calculations might be adduced to prove still further advantages; for instance, from Newport, in Rhode Island, and from Albany to New York, is nearly an equal distance of about 180 miles, and the passage from either is made to New York in about 36 hours; so that, adding them to the distance from New York to Baltimore, a passage would be made of 358 miles, nearly with certainty, in about 90 hours.

The Chesapeake and Delaware canal is intended to be made of the depth of seven feet six inches, which will accommodate all the vessels usually plying on the Chesapeake and Delaware, and is such as all vessels employed in the whole interior navigation of the United States may be easily conformed to. When that canal is opened, the communication will be complete from Norfolk or the Capes of Virginia, and from all the towns and landings on the Chesapeake, and its numerous waters, for a distance of near four hundred miles, to Trenton, on the Delaware; and should the Jersey canal be opened, this distance will be extended 250 miles further, if to Albany, and nearly 300, if to Newport and Providence.

It is easy, however, to see, by examining any map of the United States, that this extent may be carried much further. To the southward, the canal through the Dismal Swamp, now in execution, will open the communication to the waters of Albemarle Sound, and from thence, through the inlets, to South Carolina and Georgia. To the northward a communication is now nearly opened from Albany, up the Mohawk river, to Lake Ontario, and all the upper lakes; if a similar one be made from the Hudson river to Lake Champlain, it will extend the navigation to Quebec; and to the eastward, if the pass from Buzzard's to Boston bay be opened, which has been contemplated, it will, in like manner, extend it to Boston and all the coasts of Massachusetts.

Thus, with opening only a few short passes, of which the Chesapeake and Delaware canal is the great and preliminary one, a communication may be made nearly free from all the dangers of the ocean along the whole coast of the United States.

This communication will derive immense advantages, and in turn impart them to the local situations through which it passes in the several States; its general course, particularly from the Chesapeake to New York, will be nearly Northeast and Southwest, by which the navigation will be aided by the most prevailing winds, especially through the Spring and Summer; it will either intersect or be blended with all the rivers which lead into the interior of the several States; hence, its shores will form an immediate deposite for all their produce; it will also visit numberless smaller streams on which manufactories are or may be established, supply them with materials, and in turn carry from them their produce.

Such are the advantages of this communication, at all times, whether in peace or war; but, in the latter state, which the country has already, and may again experience, these advantages are increased to an incalculable degree. The principal advantage which the British derived in the Revolutionary war, arose from the command they possessed of the sea and of our coast by their navy; this advantage may be again obtained for some time, and forms the chief means by which an enemy can injure us, as it requires a considerable navy to guard our extensive coast. The consequences of these advantages were, first, in blocking up our harbors and seizing our seaports, the trade of which being destroyed, the sufferings of all those districts which depended on them for a market and supply of foreign articles became very great; secondly, our trade abroad being destroyed, supplies, though often obtained in abundance at various parts of our extensive seacoast, in defiance of the vigilance of an enemy, were but very partially dispersed through the country; and, thirdly, by the rapidity with which a naval force could move along our seacoast, their armies were easily conveyed from one port to another, to attack us in numerous points at once, to make incursions, and do great injury before our armies could move against them by land with the necessary baggage, artillery, and stores. Hence, several armies became necessary, and, even with these, the difficulty of communication rendered it by no means easy to form an adequate defence of our extensive country.

But if the communication in question be formed, our defence becomes comparatively easy. In the course of the late war, even in Europe, canals were an immense advantage to the armies who possessed them. In France, Flanders, and Holland, they formed a great and powerful aid; and one instance in Ireland will show the advantages derived from them here. In one of the invasions of that country, when the French had landed in the western counties, upon the intelligence reaching Dublin, an army of 10,000 men, completely equipped, with all their artillery and baggage, embarked on the canal, and, by attaching the cavalry horses to the boats, the whole was conveyed, ready for action, sixty miles in ten hours—a distance which would otherwise have required three or four days, with all the disadvantages arising from the fatigues of a march.

By these means, if an army were stationed in the vicinity of either of the canals in Delaware or Jersey, both of which are central to the United States, they might be conveyed from the Chesapeake to New York, or still further eastward or southward, with as much expedition as an enemy could sail along the coast.

Our late excellent President and Commander-in-Chief, General Washington, was known often to have expressed and lamented the disadvantages which he sustained for want of such a communication, especially from the Delaware to the Chesapeake, as not only by far the greatest proportion of the supplies for the army at all times were drawn from the Chesapeake, to such an extent as to require four hundred wagons nearly in constant employ, but, in his march to the southward, the baggage, stores, and heavy artillery were conveyed by water, and upwards of one hundred river-craft employed for the purpose, from Philadelphia to Christiana bridge, and again on the Chesapeake. Yet such was the difficulty of procuring wagons to convey them across the isthmus that he experienced inconceivable delay in going to the Southern army; and if the enemy had embarked again for New York or Jersey, those countries must have been completely invested before he could have returned to their assistance.

As a military work, a canal is in itself of that nature that, while it affords the utmost advantage to an army of the country, it can be of no use to an invading enemy, being a deep ditch; especially when of the size intended to be constructed from the Chesapeake to the Delaware, it presents a strong front against attack, capable of being defended by batteries, and passable only with the same difficulties as rivers and streams, the possession of which is always an object of consequence in defence. If an enemy be likely to gain possession of it, the withdrawing the boats, and letting off the water, which are easily to be accomplished in a retreat, would render it useless to them; while all the injury they could do it could be easily repaired, when it became again in possession of the country. This fact was verified in the attack made by the British army upon Ostend, in 1798, expressly for the purpose of destroying one of the finest canals in Flanders, which had been of great use to the French army in defence of that country; but though they landed and succeeded in destroying the basin and principal works at the entrance of the canal, yet, having no boats to pass into the interior, that army was soon overcome, and the canal in a few weeks completely restored to use.

So sensible are the English nation of the immense benefit of canals as works of defence, that, in addition to the numbers they now possess, they have devoted part of their army to form another, expressly as a protection against invasion. This canal is intended to extend from London to the coast of Kent, near Romney, by which means troops from the metropolis and all the interior of the country may be immediately conveyed to that part of the coast most favorable to the landing of an enemy, while, by strengthening the banks of the canal with forts, a succession of posts would be kept up to annoy and retard the march of any army which should land, and to secure the retreat of their own.

In this view, the situation of the Chesapeake and Delaware canal is one of the most admirable that occurs in the United States, or could be desired in any country. It is placed at a great distance from the ocean. The river Delaware may be easily made defensible below the mouth of the canal by batteries, a small navy, and other means which have already formed an admirable defence of that river. The Chesapeake Bay could also be defended by a naval force far less than would be adequate to protect the coast; but if an enemy should force its passage up either bay, or land below, and march to possess themselves of the canal, time would be given to prepare for defence; the facility of communication in the interior would concentrate the forces of the country, and the position of the neighboring grounds would enable them to make a bold and successful stand.

This position is indeed at once so strong and so central that it is highly probable that, in any future attack of the country, it would be selected as the station of an army of defence for the Middle States. Along the northwest line of the canal the eminences of Iron hill and Gray's hill form high, bold, insulated points, capable of being fortified against any attack, commanding the whole course of the canal within sight, and but a few miles distant from both the Chesapeake and Delaware bays; while in their rear they have the interior of the upper part of Maryland, Delaware, and Pennsylvania, for drawing supplies, and affording one of the strongest countries for retreat.

Chesapeake and Delaware Canal.

SENATE.

The distance of this position is also nearly equal from the State of New York and from Virginia; to either of which an army could be conveyed in a few hours, by the means already pointed out, should an attack be made against them.

The practicability of forming canals is at this period no longer a matter of doubt or speculation. In Europe, every obstacle of nature has been overcome in order to accomplish them; where mountains or hills interpose, they are either ascended and descended again by locks, or they are perforated, and the canals carried through them, often for many miles; valleys are crossed by embankments or by aqueducts; streams and rivers by bridges of masonry, differing from common ones only in their superior strength; morasses are drained or filled up; and, in short, the execution of the numerous works which have been made, or are now making, furnishes at once proofs and models of every kind of work which can occur in effecting canal navigation; so that, at this moment, they do not remain an object of invention, but simply of imitation and perseverance.

The communication over the isthmus of the Chesapeake and Delaware is of that nature to have invited the attention of all men who had just ideas of the important objects of canal navigation, from the earliest settlement of the country. No sooner had the genius of the Duke of Bridgewater planned his great improvements in England than the spirit and enterprise of the country, even when so young in the arts and feeble in its means, was excited to imitate them. So long ago as the years 1769 and 1770, a committee of the Philosophical Society, consisting of Dr. Franklin, Mr. Rittenhouse, Mr. Hollingsworth, Mr. Thomas Gilpin, and several others, were appointed to survey this country, and they ascertained, in the fullest manner, not only the ease, but the practicability of a canal. The ability of the country, however, was at that period inadequate to undertake it; and, the war occurring soon after, the task of performing it was reserved for the present age, with the immense advantages it possesses in means, and in the numerous examples furnished by other nations.

The operations and surveys which have been made by the company now formed, within the last three years, will appear by the reports they have published, (which will be presented herewith,) and will furnish the fullest confirmation of those formerly made, with a variety of other facts, which the superior knowledge and ability of engineers at the present period enable them to make.

The course of the canal, as now marked out and decided upon, from Welch Point, on Elk river, where vessels of any size may approach it, to bold navigable water on the Christiana, near the Delaware, is twenty-one miles. All this course is over a country wholly unimpeded by hills, rocks, morasses, or any material difficulty whatever. The canal is intended to be supplied by water from Elk river and White Clay creek, taken at positions on each of them sufficient to give the necessary elevation, and conducted by feeders, or canals of supply, to the main canal itself. These feeders are constructed on a smaller scale than the main canal, but are also made sufficient for barge navigation, and promise to afford a considerable augmentation to the profits of the work, as they extend northward nearly to the boundaries of Maryland and Delaware with Pennsylvania, countries affording stone, lime, timber, and many mineral productions in great demand in the Southern States, and numerous mill-seats, which may be converted into manufactories by the aid the canal will give them.

As the supply of the canal with water was the basis of its navigation, when completed, and afforded great advantages to all the operations of the work itself, by furnishing water carriage for removing the earth, stone, and other necessary materials, the company have been engaged, thus far, in completing the canal of supply from Elk river, which was found to furnish sufficient water for opening the canal, and for navigation upon it. The ground through which this feeder has been constructed presented many difficulties not occurring in the main canal itself, as, in passing upwards to the course of the feeder, it enters a hilly country abounding with ridges of stone, deep valleys, and many other objects of labor; none, however, of more difficulty than yielded to a moderate degree of perseverance; and the board feel a great degree of satisfaction that, in nearly completing it, as they have done, they have had time and opportunity to form and mature a system for their operations, to gain considerable experience, to collect a body of excellent workmen, and, by encountering their greatest difficulties in their outset, to be prepared to enter upon the work of the main canal itself with superior confidence and advantage. The course of the feeder which has already been opened is about five miles, which is completed, except a few short spaces, and the construction of the necessary bridges and other masonry. The work of a few months, therefore, will render this part of the undertaking complete, and confine the future operations of the company to the main canal itself.

As some estimate of the expense of this undertaking may be required, the committee have only to mention that, in all works, whether of a public or private nature, and even in those of the most simple and customary construction, difficulties occur in forming just estimates, and still more in confining the expenditure to them when made. This observation, they are sensible, must forcibly apply to a work nearly new in its kind in these States, and of a nature more complicated than usual; but, in the present instance, the board possess the advantage of considerable experience, which they trust they can apply, with some confidence, to an estimate of their future work; they, therefore, with as much certainty as can be expected in an undertaking of the kind, calculate that the completion of the main canal will not exceed $25,000 per mile, or $550,000 altogether.

In the commencement of this undertaking, the private subscriptions amounted to near $400,000, of which about one-fourth has been received and expended in purchases of the water-rights and land, and in the preparations necessary to collect and accommodate a large body of workmen, and to supply them with tools and materials, and in the operations of the feeder. From the subscriptions, also, some deduction must be made for losses by bankruptcy, deceased persons, and those casualties which attend the collection of money. After all these are deducted, there remains a large sum of efficient funds for the purpose of continuing the work.

The chief difficulty, however, which the board have experienced, which offers itself as the obstacle to their progress, and forms the basis of their application to Congress, is the despondency of the private subscribers, many of whom are persons of small or moderate fortunes, to whom the amount of their subscriptions is of considerable consequence, and who, therefore, are actuated by fears, and feel the deprivation of capital and interest, for a few years, until the canal can be completed, more forcibly than the just and reasonable hopes that, when completed, the canal, in addition to its great public utility, will afford a large private emolument.

The calculations which have been formed upon this head have been founded upon the knowledge obtained by the board of the vast trade at all times carried on across the peninsula, even under the great inconvenience of carriage by land, a just appreciation of the increase of this trade, and the numerous advantages otherwise offered by the canal.

It, therefore, appears essentially necessary to the completion of this work that the patronage and support of it should be taken up by the public, and that the hopes of individuals should rest upon something beyond private exertion. In the present moment, it may be considered as one of those children of the public which is struggling for existence, and demanding that aid which may confirm its strength and enable it to advance to maturity. If deprived of this support, it will probably perish, and not only become an object of great public injury and regret, in itself, but, in its example, protract the undertaking of all great works, or load them with despondency if begun. The aid of the Legislature of the United States would completely revive the spirit and hopes of the subscribers, bring forth their exertions, and give to the company that confidence which would enable them to draw resources from their own means, as the subscriptions of the individuals would be immediately obtained whenever a small degree of public protection and support is given them.

Of the advantage of this protection and support, the history of the political economy of all countries furnishes the most ample proof. Every nation has found it necessary, in its first attempts to establish manufactures, roads, canals, and even commerce itself, whether foreign or internal, absolutely to begin them at the public expense, or to cherish the efforts which the enterprise and public spirit of individuals prompt them to make. The States of Holland and of the Low Countries first made, and have ever since supported, their canals with the public money. Henry IV constructed the canal of Briare, and several others, by the same means. Louis XIV not only introduced the manufactures of France by his own institutions, but paid the expense of the canal of Languedoc, and afterwards gave it to Mr. Riquet, the engineer, forever: and the whole history of the English nation, and of every session of its Parliament, is replete with donations and acts for granting the public aid and protection to every work which is calculated to promote the general system of political economy; from whence has arisen that enterprise in individuals which attempts every improvement, from the confidence created by so many successful examples, and by the certainty that the Government will, in some way, lend its support where private means are not sufficient.

The Chesapeake and Delaware canal, though so admirable in its natural situation, and of such immense importance, has some difficulties of a political nature to encounter, which particularly places it under the protection of Congress. It passes through the extremities of two States, viz: Delaware and Maryland, and near to that of another, (Pennsylvania,) without being so central to either as to command the general interests of either Government, especially as both Maryland and Pennsylvania have so many objects of a similar kind in the interior of their own States; and Delaware is possessed of means too limited, to give the necessary encouragement. Hence, though the advantages to all these States are undoubtedly great, its importance as a national work, and as an undertaking which one State relies on the other to attempt, prevents its receiving the full support of either, and compels it to look to Congress for aid and protection as a national work.

Of what nature or in what way it may appear expedient for the Federal Legislature to grant its aid to this undertaking, it is by no means proper, or within the province or abilities of the committee to point out; whether in subscribing to a number of shares, or in a specific grant, such as has been given to harbors, roads, light-houses, and works of a similar nature, or in any other manner, must be left wholly to the superior knowledge and discretion of the Legislature. All that the committee wish to impress on the members to whom they respectfully offer these observations is, the immense importance of the undertaking itself; the necessity of public support to insure its progress or save it from ruin; and the certainty that even a very moderate aid will increase its private support, and insure the execution of a work, great, indeed, in its own importance, but still greater as the basis and example of all others which the improvement of our country may require, or the genius and enterprise of its citizens undertake for the general benefit of the Union, detached from the objects of particular States, of which the wisdom of Congress will always form the best judgment and discrimination.

the expenses of Government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying a direct tax upon the United States, and to provide for assessing and collecting the same;" and also the act, entitled "An act to provide additional revenue for defraying the expenses of Government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying a direct tax upon the District of Columbia;" a bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for ordnance and ordnance stores, for the year 1816;" a bill, entitled "An act rewarding the officers and crew of the sloop of war Hornet, for the capture and destruction of the British sloop of war Penguin;" a "resolution requesting the President to present medals to Captain Stewart, and the officers of the frigate Constitution;" also, a "resolution requesting the President to present medals to Captain James Biddle, and the officers of the sloop of war Hornet;" in which bills and resolutions they request the concurrence of the Senate.

BRITISH DEPREDACTIONS.

Mr. BARBOUR, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom were referred the petitions of Nicholas Boilevin, of John de Lassize, and of Jumonville de Villiers and others, praying compensation for losses sustained by the depredations of the enemy in the late war, made an adverse report thereon; which was read, and is as follows:

That no doubt exists on the minds of the committee as to the truth of the facts disclosed in the petitions; the losses complained of, resulting from a barbarous warfare carried on by the ferocious inhabitants of the wilds, as well as by the regular forces of His Britannic Majesty, have been most severe on the unfortunate petitioners. Whether it becomes the magnanimity of a Government whose only object should be the protection and prosperity of all its citizens to dispense relief in cases like these, and thereby to cause the war to fall equally on all, is a question which the committee believe is placed beyond their cognizance, in consequence of the course heretofore pursued by Congress in regard to losses sustained during the war—a course which seems to inculcate that indemnity is due to all those whose losses have arisen from the acts of our own Government, or those acting under its authority; while losses produced by the conduct of the enemy are to be classed among the unavoidable calamities of war, and do not entitle the sufferers to indemnification by the Government. The losses of the petitioners belong to the latter class, and therefore the committee, yielding to what is believed to be the settled purpose of Congress, have agreed to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the petitions of Nicholas Boilevin, John de Lassize, and Jumonville de Villiers, and others, are unreasonable, and ought not to be granted.

PETITION OF THOMAS CUTTS.

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Finance and an Uniform National Currency, to whom was referred the petition of Thomas Cutts, of Biddeford, in the State of Massachusetts, made a report, which was read, as follows:

That a judgment was recovered in favor of the United States against Tristram Hooper, Moses Lowell, and Benjamin Chandler, on a revenue bond; an execution issued thereon against their property, and was levied by the deputy marshal for the District of Maine, on three-eighth parts of the schooner Catharine, at the sale of which, on the 19th January, 1808, the petitioner, Thomas Cutts, became the purchaser, at four hundred and twenty-five dollars. A claim was afterwards set up to the said three-eighths of said schooner by Asa Stephens, founded on an attachment previously levied thereon; and in an action brought against the petitioner, it appears the title of the said Stephens to three-fourth parts of said three-eighth parts of said schooner was established; and it was of course decided, that no right to the said three-fourth parts vested in the petitioner by his purchase at said marshal's sale. The petitioner alleges that, besides the loss of the three-fourths of said three-eighths of this vessel, he has been put to great expense and trouble in defending his supposed title, derived from said marshal's sale, and prays such relief as Congress may deem just and equitable.

The committee cannot perceive anything in this case to distinguish it from the ordinary case of a sale under an execution, in which the plaintiff cannot be considered as warranting the title to the property. The purchaser buys at his own risk, and must judge for himself, from the best information he can obtain, whether the title of defendant in the execution be good or not; and it is believed he generally regulates the price he offers according to the opinion he forms on this point. The committee are therefore of opinion the petitioner is not entitled to relief, and recommend to the Senate the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

WEDNESDAY, February 21.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill entitled "An act to increase the pensions of Robert White and Jacob Wrighter," together with the report of the Committee on Military Affairs thereon; and the report having been disagreed to, whether it would be expedient and proper to prohibit by law the formation of private banking associations, in future, within the District of Columbia; and also to consider and inquire whether it would be expedient and proper to prohibit by law the emission and circulation of the notes of all unchartered banks within the said District, which shall not have obtained charters on or before the — day of — next.

ROBERT FULTON'S HEIRS.

Mr. KING presented the petition of Harriet Fulton, widow and executrix of the late Robert Fulton, praying the extension of his patent, as inventor of a method of navigating vessels by the agency of fire and steam, for reasons stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to a select committee to consist of five members; and Messrs. KING, DAGGETT, MASON of Virginia, MORROW, and CHACE, were appointed the committee.

The memorial is as follows:

To the honorable the Congress of the United States: The petition of Harriet Fulton, widow and executrix of the late Robert Fulton, humbly represents:

That the said Robert Fulton, on the 11th day of February, 1809, and on the 9th day of February, 1811, obtained two patents from the President of the United States, as the inventor of a method of navigating vessels by the agency of fire and steam; and departed this life on the 23d day of February last, leaving your petitioner and four young children dependent on his said invention for support, and a large debt, which arose from his unwearied and expensive efforts in prosecuting and perfecting this great improvement.

That notwithstanding various attempts have been made to propel vessels by the power of steam, yet he was the first person who established its practical effects in navigation. It is unnecessary to expatiate on the advantages of this important discovery; they are particularly felt and acknowledged in all parts of the civilized world. America, peculiarly favored in the number, magnitude, extent, and importance of her navigable waters, must look for her highest prosperity in her internal communication and trade; and it is now undeniably established that steam vessels can surmount difficulties heretofore considered insuperable; that neither tide, nor wind, nor current, can arrest their course; and that for velocity of progress, economy of transportation, and facility of communication, they are superior to all competition.

It is well known to your honorable body that all great improvements in human affairs are the result of patient investigation and elaborate industry; that, in their origin, their progress, and final perfection, application must be associated with genius; and, particularly in those beneficial inventions which are connected with combinations of mechanical powers, not only extraordinary faculties are required, but heavy expenses must be incurred, great risks must be sustained, and much time must be consumed, before they are brought to any perfection. The greatest benefactors of the human race have generally done but little for themselves; and, after having devoted their lives with indefatigable labor and with disinterested zeal to the general good, they have left no legacy to their posterity but an illustrious reputation.

Your petitioner is fully sensible of the delicacy of her situation; she is conscious that she may expose herself to the imputation of vanity; but surely the partiality of a wife will be pardoned, and the tender affections of a parent consulting the welfare of her children will be an apology. In order to support their cause, it is necessary to speak of their father, and, alas! all her recollections of his worth are imbibed by affliction for his loss.

After the husband of your petitioner had obtained a patent for his invention, several years necessarily elapsed before he derived any revenue from it, and in the intervening time he was exposed to enormous expense. He, in consequence, left a debt exceeding $150,000, which was incurred to raise the capital required for this complicated and expensive operation; neither was he, in his lifetime, able to derive any profit from the sale of his patent right, but incurred great expense in defending it against charges and imputations that the same had not been regularly obtained, or that some formal requisite had been omitted; when, without his enthusiasm, industry, and talents, this great improvement would, probably, have been lost to the world.

If the patronage of Government ought to be in proportion to the benefits diffused, then your petitioner can, without arrogance, appear before you, and solicit, in behalf of herself and her children, a liberal extension of his patent; for, without this indulgence, it will be impossible to derive any essential benefit from it.

It has been the policy of enlightened Governments in modern times to encourage the efforts of genius, and to hasten the progress of discovery, by exclusive privileges for definite periods; a limitation of time is, of course, prescribed as a rule of general application, during which it is presumed that the patentee will obtain a sufficient remuneration for his expenses, and for the benefits he has rendered to society; but, on extraordinary occasions, justice and expediency unite in favor of extending the time of the grant, and cases have frequently occurred where this indulgence has been obtained.

In Great Britain a patent for fourteen years was granted to James Watt for a newly invented method of lessening the consumption of steam and fuel in fire engines; an act of Parliament was, six years thereafter, passed, extending the privileges given by the patent to twenty-five years. Thus Mr. Watt, for an improvement in steam engines, received from the munificence of the British Government exclusive privileges for thirty-one years. The case of Oliver Evans is well known; he obtained a patent for an improvement in the machinery of mills, and Congress afterwards passed a law extending the patent seven years; and, notwithstanding the acknowledged utility of those inventions, no one will contend that they ought to be placed on an equal footing with steam vessels.

But your petitioner's husband did not confine his views to this subject alone. The public defence occupied his utmost attention, and engaged his most anxious solicitude. During the late war he devised a steam frigate for the better protection of our cities and harbors. While superintending the execution of this impregnable fortress, he laid the foundation of the disease which terminated his life in a short period. And ought not the widow and the offspring of the man who has planned the means of protecting his country against its enemies to be placed above the pressure of embarrassment and the humiliation of dependence? For such services he never sought, or intended to receive, any remuneration from the Government.

Your petitioner thus confidently appeals to the justice and the bounty of your honorable body in behalf of the children of a man who died while zealously employed in the service of his country, and who has conferred the most extensive benefits upon the world. Let not the widow and the orphan plead to you in vain.

And your petitioner will ever pray, &c.
HARRIET FULTON.

NEW YORK, January, 1816.

SENATE CHAMBER, March 14, 1816.

DEAR SIR: An application has been made to Congress, in behalf of the widow and children of the late Mr. Fulton, for an extension of his patents for steamboats. As a popular opinion has existed that Mr. Fulton, before his death, had derived great profits from the privileges secured to him by these patents, and that his family will be likely to derive therefrom further and great emolument during the unexpired term of the patents, I am directed by a committee of the Senate to which the petition from Mr. Fulton's family is referred, to obtain such information as is within our reach respecting the situation of the pecuniary affairs or estate of Mr. Fulton. If Mr. Fulton's family already possess, or are likely to acquire, during the residue of the term of the patents, a liberal remuneration for his invention, there would seem to be no sufficient reason in favor of an extension of the patents; while, on the other hand, if such remuneration has not been, or is not likely to be received, during the unexpired term of the patents, such is the very great public utility of the steamboats which have been brought into use by Mr. Fulton, that a strong motive would be found to exist for a prolonging of the patents for the benefit of Mr. Fulton's family.

As Mr. Fulton lived in New York, the city of your residence, and was well known by you, it has occurred to me that it may be in your power to give to the committee some information on this subject.

With very great respect, I have the honor to be, dear sir, your most obedient servant,

RUFUS KING.

BROCKHOLST LIVINGSTON.

WASHINGTON, March 14, 1816.

DEAR SIR: Your favor of this date has just been delivered to me. I have no doubt that the opinion which prevails in respect to the profits made by Mr. Fulton out of his privileges secured by the steamboat patents, however general it may have become, is incorrect; at the same time, it is not at all extraordinary that such an impression should have gone abroad, as the gross receipts of the boats in which he was concerned were very large, and well calculated to excite such a belief. But those who make these calculations are not always competent to make them, and sometimes neglect or are unwilling to take into the computation the very large expenses attending such establishments. I should not have been able to form on this subject a more accurate estimate than others, had it not been for information derived from Mr. Fulton himself a very few weeks before his death. In a conversation with him on this subject, he assured me, and with very considerable emotion, that, notwithstanding the fortune which he was supposed to have made from his concern in steamboats, he had not yet paid for his share of them, but, on the contrary, was involved in so large a debt as to be induced to dispose of a great part of his interest in these patents, although I have since understood that a contract which he had entered into for that purpose had not been carried into effect at the time of his death. This statement has since been confirmed by Captain Bunker, who commanded the steamboat Fulton, who was very well acquainted with his affairs, and who has assured me that that gentleman died insolvent, which is now the general opinion in New York.

Considering the expense of building a steamboat of any size, as well as that of running her, it is not very probable that Mrs. Fulton will derive any great emolument under the present patents, during the residue of their term. Prudent men will hardly be willing to incur so great an expense, when the privilege will so soon expire, and their profits be exposed to considerable diminution. Mrs. Fulton's friends have therefore reason to fear that, unless the extension now contemplated be obtained, but little profit will be made by her during the term yet unexpired of these patents.

With very great respect, I have the honor to be, dear sir, your most obedient servant,

B. LIVINGSTON.

HON. RUFUS KING.

LOST CERTIFICATES.

THE PRESIDENT communicated a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, on the petition of John Holker, made in obedience to the resolution of the Senate, of the 9th ultimo; and the report was read. It is as follows:

In obedience to a resolution of the 9th of January, 1816, the Secretary of the Treasury has considered the memorial of John Holker, formerly Consul General of France referred to him by the Senate, and he has now the honor to submit the following report:

The material facts involved in the consideration of the memorial are the following:

That, on the 2d of January, 1780, the memorialist was possessed of loan office certificates to the amount of $426,800; part of them, to the amount of $405,100, issued from the loan office of Pennsylvania; part of them, to the amount of $7,900, issued from the loan office of Massachusetts; part of them, to the amount of $300, issued from the loan office of New Hampshire; part of them, to the amount of $800, issued from the loan office of Rhode Island; part of them, to the amount of $1,200, issued from the loan office of New York; and part of them, to the amount of $11,500, issued from the loan office of Georgia.

That, on the 2d of January, 1780, the house of the memorialist in the city of Philadelphia was burnt, and the loan office certificates above mentioned, with other valuable effects, were consumed.

That the loss of the loan office certificates was made known to Congress, as well as to the Superintendent of Finance, soon after the accident, and a renewal of the certificates claimed.

That, at the time of the accident, no provision had been made by law for the renewal of lost certificates; but, on the 10th of May, 1780, Congress passed a resolution authorizing a renewal upon certain conditions; of which those material on the present occasion were: 1st. That the certificates destroyed should be advertised immediately in the newspapers of the State where the accident happened; and, if they have been taken out of the loan office of a different State, in the newspapers of such State also. 2d. That a copy of the advertisement shall be lodged in the loan office whence the certificates issued, together with the evidence of loss. 3d. That a bond should be given, with a condition to indemnify the United States.

That the memorialist, by an advertisement dated the 8th of August, 1780, which appears in the "Pennsylvania Journal," published in the city of Philadelphia on the 9th of August, 1780, and at several subsequent dates, gave notice of the loss of the loan office certificates, and particularly described each of them.

That, on the 2d of May, 1787, the Board of Treasury considered the above advertisement as a compliance, in that respect, with the terms of the resolution of Congress of the 10th of May, 1780, and directed the loan office of Pennsylvania to renew the certificates which had been issued in that State to the amount of $405,100, upon receiving a bond from the memorialist to indemnify the United States against any future claim. These certificates were accordingly renewed.

That the memorialist, by an advertisement dated the 4th of October, 1789, which appears in the "Massachusetts Centinel," published in Boston on the — of November, 1789, and at several subsequent dates, gave notice of the loss of such of the certificates as had been issued at the loan office of Massachusetts, and particularly described them.

That the memorialist, by an advertisement dated the 26th of July, 1790, which appears in the "New York Journal," published in New York on the 6th of August 1790, and at several subsequent dates, gave notice of the loss of such certificates as has been issued at the loan office of New York, and particularly described them.

That the memorialist alleges that he caused like advertisements to be published in the States of New Hampshire, Rhode Island, and Georgia, giving notice of the loss of such certificates as had been issued at the loan offices of those States, respectively; but the newspapers in which the advertisements were published do not accompany the memorial.

That, on the 18th of February, 1792, the memorialist again formally applied to the Secretary of the Treasury for a renewal of the certificates, and was answered on the 20th of June following, that, "as the thing then appeared to the Secretary he saw no chance for the memorialist but in the final winding up of the arrangements concerning the public debt, when the existence or non-existence of the certificates would be ascertained." And this answer was accompanied with a note from the Comptroller of the Treasury, stating that "the memorialist did not comply with the resolution of Congress in advertising the certificates immediately; that, in some cases, no proper evidence was adduced that the certificates were advertised at all in the States in which they were issued; and that, in his opinion, this claim should be suspended until an arrangement of all the certificates had been completed."

That, on the 21st of April, in the year 1794, an act was passed, limiting the time for presenting claims for destroyed certificates of certain descriptions, in which it was declared "all claims for renewal of certificates of the unsubscribed debt of the United States, of the description commonly called 'loan office certificates,' or 'final settlements,' which may have been accidentally destroyed, shall be forever barred and precluded from settlement or allowance, unless the same shall be presented at the Treasury on or before the 1st day of June, in the year 1795." And the act adds, "that no claim shall be allowed for the renewal of loan office certificates destroyed before the 4th day of March, 1789, unless the destruction of the same was advertised, according to the resolution of Congress of the 10th of May, 1780, or before that time was notified to the office from which the same was issued; nor shall any claims be allowed for the renewal of loan office certificates destroyed on or after the 4th day of March, 1789, nor of final settlement certificates destroyed at any time, unless the destruction of the same was so far made public as to be known to at least two credible witnesses soon after it happened, and shall have been, before the presentation of the claim to the Auditor of the Treasury, advertised for at least six weeks, successively, in some one of the newspapers of the State in which the destruction happened, and also in some one of the newspapers of the State in which the certificates issued, if that was another State, &c.

That the memorialist's claim for a renewal of the certificates was presented, with the evidence in support of it, to the Auditor of the Treasury, on the 7th October, 1794; but the Auditor did not deem the claim admissible by him under the act of the 21st of April, 1794, and returned the papers to the memorialist on the 7th of May, 1814.

That the memorialist has made repeated applications to Congress for relief, and the applications have been referred to the Committee of Claims, and to the Department of the Treasury, but it does not appear that any report or decision has been made upon the case.

That it appears, from the records of the Treasury, that the certificates alleged by the memorialist to have been destroyed by fire on the 2d of January, 1780, were actually issued from the several loan offices mentioned in the claim of the memorialist; that none of them have ever been subscribed to the funding system; that the renewal of the certificates issued at the loan office of New York, amounting to $1,200, was claimed on the 25th of May, 1795, for Henry Bass and Ann Martin, under the act of the 21st of April, 1794, but the claim was rejected by the Auditor, because "no proof of destruction was given, nor were the certificates advertised as required by the resolution of the 10th of May, 1780; and, also, because they were claimed by the memorialist;" and that for the rest of the certificates there has been no claim, nor have they in any manner been presented at the Treasury by any other person than by the memorialist.

Under these circumstances, the memorialist prays that Congress will interpose for his relief; and the compliance with his prayer may probably depend upon the following considerations: 1st. Whether the existence, possession, and destruction of the loan office certificates are satisfactorily proved; 2d. Whether the essential forms of the law have been observed in making public the destruction of the certificates; and 3d. Whether the claim to a renewal of the certificates is barred by the positive provisions of the act of the 21st of April, 1794.

SENATE.

FEBRUARY, 1816.

1st. The existence of the certificates is proved by the public records. The possession of the certificates by the memorialist, when his house was burnt, is proved by the best evidence of which the case is susceptible. Even upon the strict rules of evidence, in a court of common law, the testimony of the interested party is, from necessity, allowed to prove the loss of written instruments, as a foundation for introducing a copy, or for proving the contents of the original. The oath of the memorialist is direct and explicit on the subject. The burning of his house on the 2d of January, 1780, was an occurrence of public notoriety; and it is, moreover, proved upon oath, independent of the oath of the memorialist. The fact that the certificates were then consumed was made known to Congress, and probably produced the act of the 10th of May, 1780. The certificates were publicly advertised in detail, at the place where they were consumed, on the 9th of August, 1780; and from that day until the present day, a period of more than thirty-five years, the memorialist has constantly urged his claim, and no counter-pretension has ever been presented, except in the instance which has been mentioned. The public records show that the United States are still indebted for the whole amount of the lost certificates.

The claim of Bass and Martin to the renewal of the certificates issued from the loan office of New York appears at the Treasury under very extraordinary circumstances, on the 25th of May, 1795, a few days before the expiration of the statute to bar it, about fifteen years after the memorialist had advertised their loss in Philadelphia, and about five years after he had advertised their loss in New York. From the 25th of May, 1795, until the present time, Bass and Martin have ceased to claim; and it is represented that the memorialist, uniformly declaring the claim to be unfounded, has suggested that the description of the certificates was fraudulently taken from his advertisement in the newspapers of New York.

It is believed, upon this view of the case, that the existence, possession, and destruction of the certificates claimed by the memorialist are satisfactorily established.

2d. On the 2d of January, 1780, when the certificates were destroyed, there existed no law prescribing the form for making the loss public, and for obtaining a renewal. Subsequent regulations ought, therefore, to be applied to the case, upon the most liberal construction, in favor of a claimant.

The act of the 10th of May, 1780, established regulations upon the subject, for the first time providing,

1. That all certificates destroyed through accident should be advertised immediately in the newspapers of the State where the accident happened, but this rule for an immediate advertisement could not apply to the case of certificates which had been burnt four months previously; and, accordingly, the Board of Treasury allowed that an advertisement three months subsequently, on the 9th of August, 1810, with respect to the certificates issued at the loan office of Pennsylvania, was a compliance with the act of Congress in point of time.

2. That if the certificates had been taken out of the loan office of a State, different from the State in which they were destroyed, they should be advertised in such State also, and the claim and evidence left with the loan officers. The advertisement is proved to have been made in the years 1789 and 1790, in the States of Massachusetts and New York, as to the certificates issued in those States, respectively, and it is alleged to have been made about the same time in the States of New Hampshire and Georgia. The reasons assigned for not making an advertisement in those States at the time that it was made in Pennsylvania, are, principally, that the act of Congress was not deemed to apply strictly to the case, and that the then hostile possession of the country by the British troops rendered the measure impracticable.

It seems, indeed, to have been the sense of the Secretary and Comptroller of the Treasury, in 1792, that nothing had occurred up to that time which was fatal to the claim of the memorialist; but that the claim ought to be suspended until the general arrangement of the certificates had been completed under the funding system, when the existence or non-existence of the particular certificates in question would be ascertained. The arrangement has been long completed, and the lapse of more than twenty-five years strips the case of all reasonable doubt upon the non-existence of the certificates, whatever may have been the failure of advertising their loss in strict form.

3d. The act of the 21st of April, 1794, barred all claims for the renewal of loan office certificates which were accidentally destroyed, unless they were presented at the Treasury on or before the 1st of June, 1795. But the claim of the memorialist was presented on the 7th of October, 1794, and, therefore, it is not barred by the lapse of time.

The act further declares, however, that no claim shall be allowed for the renewal of loan office certificates destroyed before the 4th of March, 1789, unless the destruction of the same was advertised according to the resolution of Congress of the 10th of May, 1780, or, before that time, was notified to the office from which the same was issued. But the certificates in question were destroyed before the 4th of March, 1789; and they were advertised in the manner, at the times, and under the circumstances, which have been already stated.

Upon the whole, the Secretary of the Treasury has the honor to conclude this performance of the duty which the Senate has assigned to him with these propositions:

1. That the loan office certificates constitute a debt of record, which the United States have never paid or satisfied.
2. That the debt has not been barred by the act of limitations, in consequence of the lapse of time prescribed for claiming it at the Treasury.
3. That the debt has, nevertheless, been disallowed by the Auditor, because the destruction of the certificates was not advertised and notified in the strict form prescribed by the resolution of the 10th of May, 1780.
4. But that, under all the circumstances of a contemporaneous, constant, and public claim, the memorialist is entitled to the relief solicited from the Legislature, upon giving a bond of indemnity.

All which is respectfully submitted.

A. J. DALLAS,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. V. submitted the following resolution for consideration; which was read, and passed to the second reading:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring, That the following be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which, when ratified by three-fourths of the said Legislatures, to be valid, to all intents and purposes, as part of the said Constitution, viz:

"That, for the purpose of choosing Representatives in the Congress of the United States, each State shall, by its Legislature, be divided into a number of districts, equal to the number of Representatives to which such State may be entitled.

"Those districts shall be formed of contiguous territory, and contain, as nearly as may be, an equal number of inhabitants, entitled, by the Constitution, to be represented. In each district the qualified voters shall elect one Representative, and no more.

"That, for the purpose of appointing electors of President and Vice President of the United States, each State shall, by its Legislature, be divided into a number of districts, equal to the number of electors to which such State may be entitled. Those districts shall be composed of contiguous territory, and contain, as nearly as may be, an equal number of inhabitants entitled, by the Constitution, to representation. In each district the persons qualified to vote for Representatives shall appoint one elector and no more. The electors, when convened, shall have power, in case any of those appointed as above described shall fail to attend for the purposes of their said appointment, on the day prescribed for giving their votes for President and Vice President of the United States, to appoint another or others to act in the place of him or them so failing to attend.

REVENUE BILLS.

On motion by Mr. CAMPBELL, the Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill entitled "An act to reduce the amount of direct tax upon the United States and the District of Columbia, for the year 1816; and to repeal in part the act entitled 'An act to provide additional revenue for defraying the expenses of Government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying a direct tax upon the United States, and to provide for assessing and collecting the same;" and also the act entitled "An act to provide additional revenue for defraying the expenses of Government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying a direct tax upon the District of Columbia," together with the amendments reported thereto, by the Committee on Finance; and Mr. VARNUM was requested to take the Chair.

On the question to agree to the first amendment proposed, as follows:

Sec. 1, line 2, after the word "that," strike out the rest of the section, and insert, in lieu thereof, "instead of the direct tax of six millions of dollars annually laid upon the United States, by the act entitled 'An act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying a direct tax upon the United States and to provide for assessing and collecting the same,' passed the 9th of January, 1815, a direct tax of three millions of dollars be, and the same is hereby annually laid upon the United States, and apportioned to the States respectively, in the manner and according to the sums prescribed by the first section of an act entitled 'An act to lay and collect a direct tax within the United States,' passed the 2d day of August, 1813, and all the provisions of the act first above named, passed the 9th of January, 1815, except so far as the same have been varied by subsequent acts, and are varied by this act, shall be held to apply to the assessment and collection of the direct tax of three millions of dollars hereby laid upon the United States; which said tax shall be and remain pledged for the same purposes and in the same manner as the said tax of six millions of dollars was, in and by the said last-mentioned act.

NAYS—Messrs. Barry, Bibb, Campbell, Condit, Dana, Goldsborough, Horsey, Howell, Macon, Mason of Virginia, Morrow, Ruggles, Talbot, Tait, Thompson, Turner, Varnum, Wells, Williams, and Wilson.

On motion by Mr. MASON, of New Hampshire, to strike out the second section of the bill, as follows:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the direct tax of three millions of dollars be, and the same is hereby laid upon the United States, for the year 1816, and apportioned to the States respectively in the manner and according to the sums prescribed by the first section of an act, entitled "An act to lay and collect a direct tax within the United States," and all the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying a direct tax upon the United States, and to provide for assessing and collecting the same," passed on the 9th of January, 1815, except so far as the same have been varied by subsequent acts, and excepting the first section of the said act, shall be held to apply to the as-essment and collection of the direct tax of three millions of dollars hereby laid upon the United States.

It was determined in the negative—yeas 16, nays 16, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Daggett, Dana, Fromentin, Goldsborough, Gore, Horsey, Hunter, King, Lacock, Macon, Mason of New Hampshire, Talbot, Thompson, Turner, Varnum, and Wells.

COMMERCE WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. KING, from the managers at the conference, on the subject of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill entitled "An act concerning the convention to regulate the commerce between the territories of the United States and His Britannic Majesty," made the following report:

That the conferees of the House of Representatives commenced the conference by stating, that of the treaties made in pursuance of the Constitution, while some might not, others may, require the enactment of laws to carry them into execution; and, considering the convention with England as a treaty of the latter kind, the conferees of the House of Representatives made the following objections to the bill passed by the Senate:

1st. That by the addition of the word "declared" to the usual formula, instead of a bill of positive enactment, it assumes the form of a declaratory law.

2d. That the bill is defective, because its commencement is uncertain.

3d. That it is defective, because its duration is uncertain.

4th. That it is furthermore defective in respect to the equalization of duties; it being uncertain whether, for this purpose, the native duties are to be raised, or the alien duties abolished.

The conferees of the Senate did not contest, but admitted the doctrine, that of treaties made in pursuance of the Constitution, some may not, and that others may, call for legislative provisions to secure their execution, which provision Congress, in all such cases, is bound to make. But they did contend, that the convention under consideration requires no such legislative provisions, because it does no more than suspend the alien disability of British subjects in commercial affairs, in return for the like suspension in favor of American citizens; that such matter of alien disability falls within the peculiar province of the treaty-power to adjust; that it cannot be securely adjusted in any other way, and that a treaty duly made, and adjusting the same, is conclusive, and by its own authority suspends or removes antecedent laws that are contrary to its provisions.

That even a declaratory law to this effect is matter of mere expediency, adding nothing to the efficacy of the treaty, and serving only to remove doubts wherever they exist.

The conferees of the Senate therefore insisted on retaining the word "declared," in addition to the usual formula of enactment, because it imparts to the bill passed by the Senate the character of a declaratory law; a quality without which any law would, in this case, be inadmissible.

A law that declares to be of no force or effect so much of all laws as are contrary to the provisions of the convention, recognises the existence and authority of that convention; the date and limitations of which must ascertain the commencement and duration of the law, while its stipulations place the people of the two nations on a footing of commercial equality by the abolition of discriminating duties on both sides.

Thus the bill passed by the Senate does not appear to be defective in the particulars referred to by the conferees of the House of Representatives: nevertheless, as doubts were expressed on this subject, the conferees of the Senate proposed certain amendments for the purpose of removing these doubts, and confirming the intentions and meaning of the bill.

The conferees of the Senate, therefore, recommend to the Senate, to insist on their disagreement to the amendments made to the bill by the House of Representatives, and to agree to the following amendments to the bill, which have been mutually agreed to by the conferees of the two Houses:

Line 2, after the word "act," strike out the words "or acts as are," and insert these words, "as imposes a higher duty of tonnage or of impost on vessels and articles imported in vessels of Great Britain than on vessels and articles imported in vessels of the United States."

Line 4. Strike out the word "shall," and after the word "be" insert these words, "from and after the date of the ratification of the said convention, and during the continuance thereof."

Whereupon, Resolved, That the Senate concur in the report, and that the bill be amended accordingly.

CITY OF NEW YORK.

The bill for refunding to the Corporation of New York certain moneys expended by them in the erection of breastworks, or defences, near that city, during the late war, was taken up. A motion to postpone it until to-morrow week gave rise to a wide discussion.

The motion for postponement was supported by Messrs. TALBOT, ROBERTS, LACOCK, TAYLOR, VARNUM, and BARRY, on various grounds, reducible, however, to two points; first, that the expense thus incurred was unauthorized by the United States, and ought to be subjected to a rigid scrutiny; secondly, that, if the claim was equitable, it ought not to be separated from the general class of cases of equal merit, some of which were included in a bill lying on the table of the Senate, &c.; that it was improper to legislate on a principle of favoritism on a particular case.

The motion to postpone was opposed by Messrs. TAIT, DAGGETT, KING, SANFORD, and HARPER, on the ground of the merits of the claim, as exhibited in the accompanying documents, and the impossibility and, indeed, inexpediency of including, in any general provision, the mass of incongruous cases of indemnity and compensation claimed from various parts of the United States, growing out of the late war.

The motion to postpone until to-morrow week was negatived; but, subsequently, by general consent, on motion of Mr. BARRY, the bill was postponed to Thursday next.

On motion, by Mr. LACOCK, the memorial of the Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council, of the city of New York, praying the reimbursement of certain sums advanced and expended in the defence of the third military district, together with the accompanying documents, were referred to the Secretary for the Department of War, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

AMERICAN NAVIGATION.

Mr. BIBB, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, made a report on the subject of a system of navigation for the United States, and the report was read.

Mr. B., from the committee, also reported a bill to establish a system of navigation for the United States; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading. The report is as follows:

The attention of the committee has been drawn to the policy of "confining the American navigation to American seamen" by the Message of the President of the United States. Two considerations, distinct in their character, are suggested in behalf of the measure—1st. As it might have a conciliatory tendency towards foreign nations; and, 2dly. As it would increase the independence of our navigation and the resources of our maritime defence.

"An act for the regulation of the seamen on board the public and private vessels of the United States," passed the 3d day of March, 1813, prohibits the employment, as seamen, of the subjects or citizens of any foreign nation which shall prohibit the like employment of citizens of the United States. That act furnishes indisputable evidence of the conciliatory spirit of the national councils; and a corresponding disposition on the part of other Governments only is wanting to give it effect. The committee, however, deem it expedient to advance the independence of the navigation and resources of maritime defence of the United States, and for that purpose submit a bill to the consideration of the Senate. That the nature and extent of its provisions may be the more readily understood, the following outline of the existing regulations concerning commercial vessels, and of the proposed modifications, is presented.

Commercial vessels which are registered or enrolled according to the existing laws are denominated ships or vessels of the United States. For carrying on trade with foreign countries, they are registered. For the coasting trade or fisheries of the United States, they are enrolled and licensed.

Ships or vessels built within the United States, or captured and condemned as prize, or adjudged forfeited for breach of law, and belonging wholly to citizens of the United States, may be registered or enrolled, if they are commanded by citizens either native or naturalized. Such vessels are regarded as belonging to the ports at or nearest to which the managing owners reside. And they are registered or enrolled in the offices of the customs for the districts which comprehend the respective ports.

When a vessel is registered, the ownership, name, description, and tonnage, being legally ascertained, are stated distinctly, with the name of the master, and entered in some proper book for a record or registry to be kept by the collector of the customs. A certificate of such registry is issued as evidence of ownership to accompany the vessel. In addition to the seal and signature of the Register of the Treasury of the United States, it is attested under the seal of the collector with his signature, and is countersigned by the naval officer or surveyor, where there is such an officer, for the port to which the vessel belongs. And a copy is transmitted to the Register of the Treasury.

The certificate of registry for a vessel to be employed in foreign voyages may continue in force so long as the ownership continues the same. On a change of property, if purchased by any citizen of the United States, the vessel is registered anew. When the master is changed, the collector of the customs is authorized to endorse a memorandum of such change on the certificate of registry.

The requisites for this important document are prescribed in the act of the 31st of December, 1792, entitled "An act concerning the registering and recording of ships or vessels." And various provisions in the same act were adapted to guard the interest of ship-builders and ship-owners of the United States against the intrusions or impositions of foreigners.

In relation to vessels of twenty tons or upwards which may be enrolled, the same qualifications and requisites are prescribed, and similar guards against abuses are provided in the act of the 18th February, 1793, entitled "An act for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same." A certificate of enrolment, which is issued for a coasting or fishing vessel of the United States, is strictly analogous to the certificate of registry for a merchant vessel. The documents contain similar statements respecting the vessels and the titles of the owners, and are authenticated in the same manner.

Vessels of less than twenty tons are licensed, without being enrolled, according to the act of the 18th of February, 1793. And the duty of tonnage on a licensed vessel is payable once in a year. A license is issued from the office of the customs for the vessel to be employed in the coasting trade or the whale fishery or cod fishery. It may be in force for one year, and is given under the hand and seal of the collector, who is required to make a record of such licenses, and transmit copies to the Register of the Treasury. That the privileges appertaining to ships or vessels of the United States in the coasting trade or fisheries may be fully enjoyed, the same law requires enrolled vessels to have licenses.

As the act of the thirty-first of December, seventeen hundred and ninety-two, has provided that the privileges appertaining to registered ships or vessels of the United States shall not continue to be enjoyed longer than they continue to be commanded by citizens of the United States, it has, in effect, required every such vessel to have one citizen on board as master or commander. And the same requisite is included in the act of the eighteenth of February, seventeen hundred and ninety-three, for enrolling or licensing ships or vessels. These acts contain the principal regulations for commercial shipping. There are no laws in operation which require any more of the citizens to be employed for navigating the vessels in foreign trade or in the coasting trade or fisheries. There is no act of Congress which requires the subordinate officers, or any part of the crew on board any vessel whatever, to be citizens of the United States.

On examination it appears that systematic regulations, concerning the ownership of vessels, were established by the registering act of December, 1792, and the enrolling and licensing act of February, 1793. But the United States have remained to this day without a navigation act for each branch of their commerce.

As it concerns the maritime interests of the United States, therefore, it is of importance to establish a policy requiring the commercial vessels of the United States to be navigated principally by mariners of the country. With this view, it is considered proper to allow the privileges of American character to none but vessels navigated by American mariners as the law may require; to provide for ascertaining who shall be regarded as such mariners; and to make it requisite for vessels of the United States to have documents on board as evidence of being so navigated.

That the policy may be carried into effect without inconvenience, various particulars in a system of navigation must correspond to existing laws respecting the collection of duties, the ownership of vessels, or the government of persons in the merchant service or fisheries. Several regulations similar to those already in force are proposed to be incorporated.

The documents for vessels sailing on foreign voyages may supersede the use of any other certificates of citizenship for persons employed in navigating them. And it is proposed to repeal the section of the act of May, 1796, which has authorized the collectors to deliver certificates to individual mariners. Abuses which are known to have prevailed in relation to such certificates may be avoided by requiring proper documents to accompany the vessels.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Jan. 28, 1816.

SIR: Permit me to answer your inquiries, relative to the amount of American tonnage, and the number of seamen, Americans and foreigners, employed in the merchant service, by communicating a copy of the letter, which I have addressed to the Chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations of the House of Representatives, upon the same subject. I have, &c.

A. J. DALLAS.

Hon. W. W. BIBE,

Chairman Com. Foreign Relations.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Jan. 26, 1816.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, requesting, on behalf of the Committee of Foreign Relations, information upon the following subjects:

1. The amount of American tonnage.
2. The number of seamen required for the navigation of American vessels.
3. The number of American seamen, either native or naturalized.
4. The number of foreign seamen now employed in the merchant service of the United States.

I. The annual statement of the amount of American tonnage, on the 31st of December, 1814, which was recently laid before Congress, exhibits an aggregate of 1,159,208 80-95 tons, as included in the returns made to this Department, by the collectors of the customs; but for the reasons assigned in the letter of the Register of the Treasury, accompanying that statement, the actual amount ought not to be estimated, on the 30th of December, 1814, at more than 1,029,281 85-95 tons.

By an estimate formed from the returns of the collectors, to the 30th of September, 1815, the aggregate amount of the tonnage, included in the returns, will be 1,363,758 62-95 tons; but this amount is liable to a deduction, similar to that abovementioned, and the tonnage of American vessels actually employed, at the last period, may be estimated at about 1,217,000 tons, divided in the following manner:

American tonnage employed in foreign trade, about	-	-	-	840,000
Do. in the coasting trade, about	-	-	-	350,000
Do. in the fisheries	-	-	-	27,000
Tons	-	-	-	1,217,000

II. The number of seamen required for the navigation of American vessels may be computed from the crews which they usually ship, including officers and boys, at an average of nearly six for every hundred tons employed in the foreign and coasting trade, and of about eight for every hundred tons employed in the fisheries. This computation will place the whole number of seamen, required for the navigation of American vessels, at about 70,000.

III and IV. The number of American seamen, native or naturalized citizens, and the number of foreign seamen, who are employed in the merchant service of the United States, cannot be ascertained from any documents in the Treasury Department. It is believed, indeed, that there does not exist, anywhere, the means of classing the seamen according to that discrimination; nor of ascertaining their number, except in the general mode of computation, which has been adopted upon the present occasion. The acts for the relief and protection of American seamen provide that the collector of every district shall keep a book, in which, at the request of any seaman, being a citizen of the United States, and producing proof of his citizenship authenticated in a manner which the act has omitted to define, he shall enter the name of the applicant; and that each collector shall return a list of the seamen so registered, once every three months, to the Secretary of State, who is required to lay before Congress an annual statement of the returns. It is also provided that, before a clearance be granted to any vessel bound on a foreign voyage, the master shall deliver to the collector of the customs a list containing, as far as he can ascertain, the names, places of birth, and residence, and a description of the persons who compose his ship's company, for whom he is bound to account upon his return to the United States. But experience has shown that neither the register, which only includes the names of citizens who themselves request to be registered, nor the crew lists furnished by the masters of vessels employed in the foreign trade, upon general information, afford a satisfactory test to distinguish the native from the naturalized seamen, nor even to distinguish the citizen from the alien; and that neither can be relied on to establish the aggregate number of seamen employed in the merchant service.

In the year 1807 an estimate was made to estimate the proportion of foreign to American seamen on board of American vessels; but the basis of the estimate was too unsettled and hypothetical to command confidence in the result. It was then supposed that nearly the sixth of the whole number of seamen employed in navigating American vessels were foreign seamen, and more particularly, that of the number of seamen employed in the foreign trade, at least one-fourth were foreigners. There are reasons to presume that the proportion of foreign to American seamen is less at this time than it was in the year 1807, and that it will become less still, as the nations of Europe, in consequence of the general peace, become more and more the carriers of their own imports and exports.

I have the honor to be, &c.

A. J. DALLAS.

FRIDAY, March 8.

Mr. VARNUM, from the committee to whom was referred the resolution to amend the Constitution of the United States so as to regulate the mode of choosing Representatives in Congress and Electors of President and Vice President thereof, reported it with amendments, which were read.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the committee to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill incorporating the subscribers to the Orphan Asylum of the City of Washington; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

The bill further extending the time for issuing and locating military land warrants, and for other purposes, was read the second time, and referred to the committee on the memorial of the Legislative Council and House of Representatives of the Mississippi Territory.

The resolution to amend the Constitution of the United States, so as to subject to removal from office the judges of all the courts thereof, was read the second time.

The bill to amend the act for regulating the Post Office Establishment, respecting the compensation of postmasters, and to allow the members of Congress the privilege of franking during the recess, was read a second time, and referred to a select committee; and Messrs. WILSON, ROBERTS, MORROW, CHACE, and THOMPSON, were appointed the committee.

The bill, entitled "An act authorizing and requiring the Secretary of State to issue letters patent to Andrew Kurtz, was read the second time, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. ROBERTS, WILSON, and BROWN, were appointed the committee.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That it be referred to the consideration of the Naval Committee, whether it is expedient and proper to instruct the Secretary of the Navy to cause a fair valuation to be made of the ship of war, "The Cyane," her tackle, apparel, and stores, (according to the customary mode in such cases,) and to pay to the captors the whole amount of such valuation; and that they make report thereon.

Mr. HUNTER, from the committee to whom was referred the bill providing for the publication of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, reported it with amendments; which were read.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act making further provision for military services during the late war, and for other purposes;" and, on motion by Mr. WILLIAMS, the further consideration thereof was postponed until Monday next.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of a bill to provide a law library for the use of the Judges of the Supreme Court.

[This bill proposes the appropriation of five thousand dollars, for the purchase of law books to compose a library for the use of the Supreme Court.]

After some desultory debate on the modification of the details of this bill, between Messrs. TALBOT, SANFORD, MASON of New Hampshire, and WILSON, the bill was postponed to Monday.

The bill, in addition to an act, entitled "An act in relation to the Navy Pension Fund," was read a third time, and the blank having been filled with "three hundred," the bill was amended by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be "An act in addition to an act entitled 'An act in relation to the Navy Pension Fund.'"

On motion, by Mr. MORROW, the further consideration of the bill to ascertain and establish the western boundary of the tract reserved for satisfying the military bounties allowed to the officers and soldiers of the Virginia line, on Continental Establishment, was postponed until Thursday next.

On motion, by Mr. MORROW the further consideration of the report of the committee to whom was referred the resolution relating to the claims of the officers and soldiers of the Virginia line, on State and Continental Establishment, for bounty lands, was also postponed until Thursday next.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill supplementary to the act for the indemnification of certain claimants to lands in the Mississippi Territory.

This bill proposes, in its first section, to extend the time for filing releases by claimants; and in the second regulates the manner in which the claims of the representatives of deceased persons shall be substantiated, &c.

The latter section was struck out, in pursuance of the recommendation of the select committee, the ground of which recommendation was explained by Mr. TAYLOR, to be the interference of this provision with the peculiar powers of State governments and courts, in relation to descents and the distribution of estates.

Thus amended, the bill was, without opposition, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

CASE OF GEORGE ROSSIER.

The bill for the relief of George Rossier was then taken up. The bill proposes to indemnify the above named person for the loss of two Treasury notes of a thousand dollars transmitted by mail, on the exhibition of sufficient evidence that the same have not been paid or funded, and on giving security to indemnify the United States from loss from their future appearance.

Messrs SANFORD and DAGGETT supported this bill. Mr. ROBERTS suggested, as a ground of opposition to the bill, that this was a case standing on the same footing as other cases of losses by the mail, for which the United States could not be expected to be liable. To which Mr. SANFORD replied, showing the distinction, and adducing analogous cases to show not only the equity, but the precedents of such a course as that proposed by the bill.

For the purpose of further consideration, the bill was postponed to Tuesday.

CLAIM OF COLONEL THOMPSON.

The Senate took up the bill, reported by a select committee, for the relief of John Thompson. The bill proposes to allow to Colonel Thompson interest on a claim for Revolutionary services, the principal of which was granted to him by an act of Congress in 1812.

Some investigation took place on the merit of the claim, which was supported by Messrs. ROBERTS and FROMENTIN, and was opposed by Messrs. VARNUM, TURNER, DAGGETT, MACON, KING, MASON of New Hampshire, and TAYLOR.

If the claim was just, as Congress had heretofore decided, it was said, it ought to be allowed in full; and such, it was argued, was the intention of the Congress, but not the construction at the Treasury, in the act which did pass. On the other hand it was said, that an allowance by any Congress to any claimant, ought to be considered as in full, and conclusive of what was justly due; and in this case it was moreover said, that the claim itself had been of a doubtful character, having been rejected more than once before it at last succeeded. To which it was replied, besides defending the justice of the claim, that the former decision of Congress in its favor precluded that question.

The question was taken, after much debate, on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, and decided in the negative—yeas 5, nays 15, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chace, Morrow, Roberts, Sanford, and Tait.

NAYS—Messrs. Condit, Daggett, Dana, Gaillard, Goldsborough, Hunter, King, Macon, Mason of New Hampshire, Ruggles, Taylor, Tichenor, Turner, Varnum, Wells, Williams, and Wilson.

MONDAY, March 11.

Mr. ROBERTS presented the memorial of Ferdinando Fairfax, of the City of Washington, opposing the extension of the patent of the late Robert Fulton, as the inventor of a method of navigating vessels by the agency of fire and steam, as prayed for by Harriet Fulton, for reasons stated in the memorial; which was read.

Mr. SANFORD presented the petition of William Radcliff and others, of the city of New York, praying the payment of certain debentures, which has been suspended by order of the Treasury Department of the United States, as stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to a select committee to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise; and Messrs. SANFORD, BROWN, and DANA, were appointed the committee.

Mr. DAGGETT presented the memorial of the President and Directors of the Patriotic Bank of Washington, praying a charter of incorporation, for reasons stated in the memorial; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Finance and an Uniform National Currency.

Mr. RUGGLES submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of making provision for altering the location of the road laid out from the foot of the rapids of the Miami river of Lake Erie to the western boundary of the Connecticut Reserve, so that the said road may pass through the reservation of two miles square on the Sandusky river; and also, whether any and what further provisions are necessary to be made for the surveying and sale of the public lands adjoining on the aforesaid road.

The bill incorporating the subscribers to the Orphan Asylum of the City of Washington, was read the second time.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill entitled "An act to change the mode of compensation to the members of the Senate and House of Representatives, and the Delegates from Territories;" also, a bill entitled "An act for the relief of Gustavus Loomis;" in which bills they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The two bills last mentioned were read, and passed to the second reading.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I lay before Congress a statement of the militia of the United States, according to the latest returns received by the Department of War.

JAMES MADISON.

MARCH 9, 1816.

The Message and statement were read.

The bill from the House of Representatives for making further provision for military services during the late war, was taken up; and, the question being about to be put whether it should be read a third time—

Mr. WILSON announced his intention to move an amendment to the bill, by introducing a provision which he understood had failed in the House of Representatives, but which, in his opinion, public justice, gratitude, and feeling required to be adopted. He then read the sketch of a new section to allow donations of land, in proportion to their rank, to the officers deranged by the late reduction of the Army. To ascertain whether the Senate would be willing to receive an amendment of this character, he moved to postpone the bill till to-morrow. The postponement was agreed to.

The Senate next took up the bill to establish a Law Library at the Seat of Government, for the use of the Supreme Court of the United States. There was some debate on this subject, not in opposition to the provision of law books for the purpose designated as well as for the use of Congress, but on a motion of Mr. WILSON to amend the bill by striking out so much thereof as proposes to place the law books to be purchased in an apartment separate from the general library; which was negatived, 13 to 8.

The bill was ordered to a third reading. [The appropriation proposed in the bill to be applied to its object at this time is five thousand dollars.]

The bill for the relief of John M. Forbes, which came from the Representative Hall, was next considered; and after a due explanation by Mr. HUNTER of its object, (to authorize a settlement of Mr. Forbes's account for interest and difference of exchange of money paid in Europe for the support of distressed seamen) the bill was ordered to be read a third time.

The bill concerning the District of Columbia (respecting the introduction of slaves from adjoining States) was, on motion of Mr. LACOCK, postponed to Friday.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on Military Affairs, on the petition of the representatives of Ignace Delino; and on motion, by Mr. WILLIAMS, the further consideration thereof was postponed until Monday next.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report of the Secretary for the Department of War, made in obedience to the resolution of the Senate of the 7th instant, on the memorial of the Mayor and Common Council of the city of New York; and the report was read.

The bill providing for the publication of the decisions in the Supreme Court of the United States, was considered, amended, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. [The bill proposes to allow to a Reporter of the decisions of the Supreme Court, one thousand dollars per annum, provided the said decisions be published within six months after the adjournment each year, and fifty copies thereof delivered free of charge to the Secretary of State, to be distributed as prescribed by the bill.]

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill dividing the State of Pennsylvania into two judicial districts; and, on motion by Mr. LACOCK, the consideration thereof was further postponed until Friday next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the resolution to amend the Constitution of the United States, that the judges of all the courts thereof shall be subject to removal from office; and, on motion by Mr. LACOCK, on the further consideration thereof was postponed to, and made the order of the day for Monday next.

YAZOO CLAIMS.

The bill further supplementary to the act entitled "An act providing for the indemnification of certain claimants of public lands in the Mississippi Territory," was read a third time.

The blank for the day to which the time for filing releases is extended, was, on motion by Mr. TAYLOR, filled with the first Monday in December next.

The blank for the additional compensation to each of the commissioners appointed to adjust these claims, and to the secretary of the board, in consideration of the further services required of them, was next to be filled.

Mr. TAYLOR, after a compliment to the talent, assiduity, and integrity of the board, as calling for a compensation larger than they had hitherto been allowed, and more adequate to the services rendered by them, moved to fill the blank with $1,500; which was agreed to without a division.

And thus amended, the bill was passed and sent to the House of Representatives.

FULTON'S PATENT.

The bill for the benefit of the widow and children of Robert Fulton, deceased, was next taken up:

Mr. KING proposed to postpone it to Wednesday; Mr. ROBERTS to recommit it.

In the little debate which took place, Mr. ROBERTS referred to the memorial this morning presented, as affording a reason why the bill should not pass, or at least should receive reconsideration in committee; he also incidentally remarked that there was no such evidence of cost in perfecting the invention, or want of profit from the use of it, as would support the claim for an extension of the patent, &c. To which Mr. KING replied, that the question of the validity of the original patent was one wholly of a judicial nature; it was one in regard to which Congress could neither take away or confer privileges—the bill could extend no rights not vested by the patent, &c., and all questions arising out of the priority of invention, &c. belonged and must remain with the courts of justice. Mr. WILSON favored commitment, though favorable to the extension of the patent.

Mr. KING having withdrawn his motion for postponement, the bill was recommitted to Messrs. KING, MORROW, DAGGETT, CHACE, and ROBERTS.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The amendment proposed to the Constitution, requiring the election of Electors and Representatives of Congress to be made in all the States by districts, was taken up; and the question stated on ordering it to a third reading.

Mr. LACOCK expressed his surprise that a proposition for amending the Constitution should be solightly treated as not to have had a day assigned for its discussion. He thought it required more deliberation; and therefore moved to postpone it and make it the order of the day for Monday.

Mr. DANA professed his readiness to vote on the question at once, with the hope that the proposition would be rejected. It seemed to him to be introducing a sort of bed of Procrustes, to declare that, because it was convenient for one State to elect its Electors and Representatives by districts, all the other States, convenient or not, should be compelled to do the same.

Without further debate, the postponement was agreed to.

TUESDAY, March 12.

Mr. TAIT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill respecting the late officers and crew of the sloop of war Wasp; and the bill was read and passed to the second reading.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution, yesterday moved by Mr. RUGGLES:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of making provision for altering the location of the road laid out from the foot of the rapids of the Miami river and Lake Erie to the western boundary of the Connecticut Reserve, so that the said road may pass through the reservation of two miles square on the Sandusky river; and also whether any and what further provisions are necessary to be made for the surveying and sale of the public lands adjoining on the aforesaid road.

This question gave rise to some discussion. Mr. KING moved to refer the resolve to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, to consider and report thereon. This motion was supported by himself, and opposed by Messrs. RUGGLES, MORROW, TAIT, and TAYLOR; the field of debate of course very limited, the question being only as to the mode of making an inquiry. The motion of Mr. KING was negatived.

The resolve, as above, was agreed to; and Messrs. RUGGLES, KING, and MORROW, appointed a committee accordingly.

The bill entitled "An act for the relief of Gustavus Loomis," was read the second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill entitled "An act for the relief of John M. Forbes," was read a third time, and passed.

On motion, by Mr. ROBERTS, the memorial of Ferdinando Fairfax, presented the 11th instant, was referred to the committee to whom was referred the bill for the benefit of the widow and children of Robert Fulton, deceased, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed the bill entitled "An act to extend certain privileges, as therein mentioned, to Bernard Edme Verjon," with amendments; in which they request the concurrence of the Senate; and that they have also passed a bill entitled "An act for the relief of John T. Wirt;" in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill last mentioned was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the committee to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill for the relief of John Holker, formerly Consul General of France to the United States; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

On motion, the Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill entitled "An act to extend certain privileges, as therein mentioned, to Bernard Edme Verjon." Whereupon,

Resolved, That they concur therein.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill entitled "An act making further provision for military services during the late war, and for other purposes; and on motion, by Mr. RUGGLES, the further consideration thereof was postponed until Monday next.

The bill to establish a law library at the seat of Government, for the use of the Supreme Court of the United States, was read a third time, and the blank filled with "two thousand."

Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be "An act concerning the library of Congress."

The bill providing for the publication of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States was read a third time, and passed.

The bill for the relief of M. Rossier (in the case of lost Treasury notes) was further considered, and ordered to a third reading, after debate, by a vote of 15 to 11.

The bill to incorporate the subscribers to the Female Orphan Asylum of the City of Washington, was taken up. Its benevolent objects were explained, its utility warmly anticipated, and the motives of its institutors justly viewed by Mr. ROBERTS. No further debate took place, except a question by Mr. WILSON as to the number of children now fostered by it; to which Mr. ROBERTS replied that the present number was seven.

On the question to engross the bill for a third reading, there were for the bill 12, against it 12. The President (Mr. GAILLARD) voting in the affirmative, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

COMPENSATION BILL.

The bill from the House of Representatives, to change the mode of compensation of the Senators, Delegates, and Representatives in Congress, was read the second time.

Mr. TAYLOR moved to refer the bill to the Committee of Finance.

Mr. BIBB opposed the reference. The principles embraced in the bill were not, he said, of a complicated nature, but such as might be determined without the formality of a reference to a committee. He confessed, that the bill was not exactly in the shape which he should prefer; but, as he thought it had decided advantages over the present system and rate of compensation, he should vote for it as it stood, and against any amendment which should be proposed. He should vote against any amendment, he said, because of the peculiar delicacy of the subject; and considering that the bill had been proposed by the House of Representatives, so much the most numerous branch of the Legislature, he was unwilling to have any controversy with that House about it. Amendments might hereafter be made by a supplementary bill, if found necessary in the course of the operation of the system.

Mr. TAYLOR said, that the course which he had proposed, was not different from that generally given to every bill coming from the House. It was the proper course to be pursued, for a variety of reasons: Suppose the salaries of other officers of the Government should be thought incompetent, the Committee of Finance might propose amendments to the bill calculated also to include them; for, he intimated, the passage of a bill to compensate ourselves alone, seemed to be too close an observance of the old but pithy adage, charity begins at home. Our foreign Ministers, he said, received, besides their outfit, a salary of nine thousand dollars, to enable them to make a display abroad: it would seem, by the distinction in favor of foreign Ministers, in this respect, as if Congress did not care what appearance our great officers of the Government exhibited at home, under our own eyes. Mr. T. said, he was not opposed to the increase of compensation of the members of the Legislature, and should vote for this bill, if so altered as to make the compensation compatible with the reasons upon which the proposed increase was obviously founded. In order to let the people know that their interests were consulted as much, where we are concerned, said he, as in other cases, I wish the bill to take the usual course of reference to a select committee.

Mr. DANA said, there was certainly something due to the delicacy of sentiment of the gentleman from South Carolina, which had induced him to make this motion. It being at all times a matter of delicacy to act on questions concerning our own compensation, Mr. D. said, he did not wonder that, in his anxiety to avoid error on the one side, he should bend over too far in the other direction. In reference to the laws heretofore passed on these subjects, he said, he found it had not been thought at all necessary to combine the compensation of Executive and Legislative officers; nor did he see why the members of Congress should measure their compensation by that of other officers of the Government. This question was one separate and distinct; it was a question of its own character, he said, and ought to stand alone. He was, therefore, opposed to commitment in order to amend the bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL said, as a member of the Committee of Finance, he was not aware that that Committee could give any information to the Senate on the subject of this bill, which would enable it to act better than they could without it. The principle of the bill, he said, was a naked one, whether the compensation of the members should or should not be increased; the question in relation to the manner of compensation was also a single question. Mr. C. said, he felt in so great a degree the delicacy which had been adverted to, that he would not say much on this subject. As to the argument that the salaries of some other officers of Government require an increase, he was not disposed to deny the fact; but, in addition to the reply that it was not necessary to connect that question with the one now before the Senate, he said, the salaries of those officers had been raised since the compensation of the members of Congress had been fixed. Mr. C. did not profess himself to be an advocate for the manner of compensation proposed by this bill; he had serious doubts on the subject; but he thought proper to state, that this measure, having been adopted by the other House, which is considered generally as immediately responsible to the people for its acts, and the members of which pride themselves on being the purse-holders of the nation, it appeared to him that this House was relieved from the necessity of probing the subject as closely as it might otherwise be proper. Not, he said, that he thought that the Senate was at all bound by their vote, but in this respect the other House was at least as responsible as this. The present compensation to the members of Congress, he was convinced, was entirely too low, if it was intended that they should have a compensation anything like competent to pay their necessary expenses. He was opposed to the reference altogether; if committed, he hoped it would be to another committee than that which had been named.

Mr. DAGGETT said, the question embraced by this bill was one which he should be always disposed to leave with the other house. He would not interfere, he said, to prevent that compensation which they should deem adequate to their services. He felt no reluctance in contending, and contending earnestly, with the House of Representatives, on questions such as that of the extent of the treaty-making power, the expediency and amount of a land-tax; indeed, on any question of a general nature; but, he said, there was an innate delicacy in the Senate's undertaking to say that the House of Representatives should not have a sort of control over questions like this. He was, therefore, disposed to take a bill of this nature, and pass it as soon as, according to the forms of the House, it could be done, and to have little said about it. If they had even increased the compensation still further, or if they had thought fit to diminish it, he should not have thought it necessary, for his part, to say a word about it.

Mr. MACON did not consider this as a question of compensation. The question now to be considered was, whether the bill was calculated to carry itself into execution. In this view it was necessary to commit it, rather than with a view to any facts or principles connected with it. The details of the bill ought to be examined, in order to see whether any rule could be devised which would suit better than that embraced by the bill. Gentlemen who considered this bill so perfect that it ought not to be touched, so plain that he who runs may read, would of course vote against commitment. He confessed that he had not himself that distinct view of it. What relates to ourselves, he said, ought more than anything else be made so plain, that no doubt could attend it. He should, therefore, vote to commit this bill, believing it might be improved. As to the rights of the two Houses, Mr. M. said, they were equal. Each House had on such a subject the same rights as the other. The presumption was, and on that ground they ought to proceed, that if this House should make a bill from the other House better than as it came from them, the House of Representatives would concur in the amendment. This was the general practice; and, in adhering to it, he did not see how the Senate could be placed in a delicate situation in relation to the other House.

Mr. CHACE was also in favor of the commitment of this bill. He did not see, he said, why gentlemen should be ready to throw the burden of this measure (if a burden it was) on the shoulders of the House of Representatives. As regards the rate of compensation generally, every man must act on it, he said, from his own conviction. Mr. C. was himself clearly of opinion that this bill wanted considerable amendment. It had been yet but a short time under consideration. He asked, whether it was a fair way of legislation, when a bill was manifestly imperfect, to insist on passing it, with a view of perfecting it by a supplementary bill, as had been intimated? Was it not best, he asked, to make the bill perfect at first? Why afraid, he asked, to approach a bill of this character? Why regard it as a measure bearing the injunction noli me tangere? The Constitution and rules of proceeding, he admitted, did seem to give to the other House the power of originating money bills; but, on a question of this kind, he did not see why this House should not be under the same obligation as the other to examine critically bills of this kind.

Mr. SANFORD said, in the course of a few remarks on this subject, that this bill should be treated as all other bills were. It was almost a matter of course on all bills to refer the subject thereof, on the motion of a member, to a committee for examination. He wished to know, as regarded his vote, what would be the effect of this bill; whether it would increase the rate of compensation of members, as well as change the mode? He wished, in short, to see this bill take the course of all other bills.

Mr. DANA again rose, and showed, that though the practice was to refer bills on their second reading, it was to examine the bearings of the bills. This bill, he said, embraced principles, the extent of which could be seen with a single cast of the eye. It had no complex details; it repealed no former acts requiring a comparison and examination of existing laws, &c. He did not, for these and other reasons, deem it necessary to commit the bill.

The question on commitment was decided in the negative—yeas 9, nays 22, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chace, King, Macon, Morrow, Rugles, Sanford, Taylor, Varnum, and Wilson.

NAYS—Messrs. Barry, Bibb, Brown, Campbell, Condit, Daggett, Dana, Gaillard, Gore, Horsey, Howell, Hunter, Lacock, Mason of New Hampshire, Roberts, Talbot, Tait, Thompson, Tichenor, Turner, Wells, and Williams.

And then, on motion, the Senate adjourned until to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, March 13.

The bill to establish a system of navigation for the United States, was read the second time, and on motion, by Mr. DANA, the further consideration thereof was postponed to, and made the order of the day for Monday, the 25th instant.

The bill respecting the late officers and crew of the sloop-of-war Wasp was read the second time.

The bill for the relief of John Holker, formerly Consul General of France to the United States, was read the second time.

The bill entitled "An act for the relief of John T. Wirt," was read the second time, and on motion, by Mr. ROBERTS, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill entitled "An act for the relief of Gustavus Loomis," reported it without amendment.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the committee to whom was referred the bill entitled "An act authorizing and requiring the Secretary of State to issue letters patent to Andrew Kurtz," reported it without amendment.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I lay before Congress a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, containing a statement of proceedings under the act to regulate the laying out and making a road from Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, to the State of Ohio, with a statement of past appropriations, and an estimate of required appropriations.

JAMES MADISON.

MARCH 12, 1816.

The Message and statements therein referred to were read.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made the 18th instant, for referring to the consideration of the Naval Committee the expediency of causing a fair valuation to be made of the ship of war "The Cyane," and to pay to the captors the amount of such valuation; and agreed thereto.

The bill for the relief of George Rossier and others was read a third time, and passed.

On motion by Mr. HARPER, the bill to limit the right of appeal from the circuit court of the United States for the District of Columbia, was referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Mr. HARPER, Mr. TALBOT, and Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, were appointed the committee.

MARCH, 1816.

Female Orphan Asylum—Compensation Bill.

SENATE.

WASHINGTON FEMALE ORPHAN ASYLUM.

The engrossed bill to incorporate the subscribers to the Washington Female Orphan Asylum was read a third time.

Mr. HARPER assigned the reasons why he should vote against the bill. If he were to judge of this question by the respectability of the names connected with it, or by the objects of the institution embraced in the bill, he certainly should vote for the bill; but it would be such a variation from the whole course and scope of our laws, that he was obliged to vote against it. Nothing, he said, could be more laudable than such associations, but he submitted whether their incorporation by law was at all necessary to enable them to perfect their object. Was this strange anomaly in law, of a body politic composed of married women, at all necessary to the objects of the institution? He could not see it. If the object was to enable the institution to acquire real property, it could be accomplished, he said, without an act of incorporation: a simple deed of trust would answer the purpose very well, &c.

Mr. ROBERTS sustained the bill. If a person were to die and leave property to the institution, unless in a corporate form, it could not inherit it. This charter, he said, was a grant of but little magnitude: it was such a privilege as, in many of the States, the courts were authorized to grant, under proper restrictions. As to the alleged novelty of the proposition, it might be new in regard to this District, because the legislation of Congress for it had been very limited; but similar acts were to be found on the statute books of some of the States. The charter would give no privilege nor sanction any abuse. It would enable the trustees of a praiseworthy institution to secure, in the most eligible and favorable manner, the application of such means as may be given by benevolent persons to the benevolent objects of the association, &c.

Mr. CAMPBELL also assigned a few reasons in favor of the bill.

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Campbell, Chace, Dana, Gaillard, Howell, Hunter, Lacock, Roberts, Sanford, Tait, Thompson, Tichenor, Turner, Williams, and Wilson.

NAYS—Messrs. Barry, Bibb, Condit, Daggett, Goldsborough, Gore, Harper, Horsey, King, Macon, Mason of New Hampshire, Morrow, Ruggles, Talbot, Taylor, Varnum, and Wells.

So the bill was rejected.

COMPENSATION BILL.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration, in Committee of the Whole, of the bill to change the mode of compensation of the Senators, Representatives and Delegates in Congress.

[This bill proposes to change the rate and mode of compensation, from six dollars per day during attendance to one thousand five hundred per annum.]

Mr. TAYLOR, in proposing an amendment to the bill, said, he was left, from the absence of reasons assigned in favor of the bill, to presume the motive of it to be, that there would be a greater despatch in the public business, if members were paid by the job than if they were paid by the day. He doubted the correctness of this inference. If, for six dollars a day, the sessions of Congress are spun out to an inconvenient length, and public business delayed by the desire of members to increase the amount of their pay, (supposing them the immoral agents which the adoption of this system presupposes)—would they not, he asked, be induced by the change in the mode of compensation, in order to curtail their expenses and increase their profits, to go home before the public business is finished, or so urge the public business as to leave it in an imperfect form? He thought, as he said yesterday, that the amount of the present allowance was incompetent; that the sacrifice was too great, to come here for nothing, and in many instances, at a certain loss. He felt a desire, however, that an alteration should be made in this bill, to lessen the inducement which it appeared to him to hold out to the members to hurry over or neglect the public business, &c. With such views, he moved to strike out three thousand (the compensation, double that allowed to the members, of the President of the Senate and Speaker of the other House) and in lieu thereof to insert two thousand dollars; with a view to reduce the compensation of the members from one thousand five hundred to one thousand, and to add a new section, for allowing, besides, three dollars per day to the members for each day they actually attend in Congress. This amendment, he said, would bring into play the principle of paying by the job, and would prevent the public work from being done in a slovenly manner, by paying a daily compensation adequate, or nearly so, to the daily expenses of the members.

Mr. MACON also moved to amend the bill so as to strike out the salary feature altogether, and in lieu thereof to insert a provision that the compensation should be hereafter — dollars per day—intending that the blank might be filled with such sum as the Senate should prefer. He was opposed to the idea of a salary for legislative services; such a rule of compensation was not known under any of the governments of the States, &c.

Mr. DAGGETT opposed all amendments of this nature to the bill; considering it better to take it in its present shape. The increase of compensation, he estimated, according to an average computation, would not be greater than as one hundred to seventy-one, &c. Was it worth while for this small object to enter into a controversy with the other House? He showed, besides, that the salaries of all the officers of Government (judges excepted, to his regret) had been increased since the compensation of the members was fixed, &c.

Both the amendments above stated were negatived without a division.

Mr. TAYLOR then proposed an amendment to the detail of the bill, which he considered very defective. The amendment was as follows:

SENATE.

Compensation Bill.

MARCH, 1816.

"That in case any Senator, Representative, or Delegate, shall not attend in his place at the day on which Congress shall convene, or shall absent himself before the close of the session, a deduction shall be made from the sum which would otherwise be allowed to him, in proportion to the time of his absence,"

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That in case any Senator, Representative, or Delegate, shall not attend in his place every day in which Congress shall be in session, within any year, deduction shall be made of his annual allowance, proportioned to the time he shall be absent, when compared to the whole time in which Congress shall be in session within the said year."

This motion gave rise to considerable debate, chiefly of a critical nature, in which Messrs. TAYLOR, DANA, CHACE, HARPER, DAGGETT, and TALBOT, took part. The motion was negatived, 26 to 7, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chace, Macon, Ruggles, Sanford, Taylor, Varnum, and Wilson.

NAYS—Messrs. Barry, Bibb, Brown, Campbell, Condit, Daggett, Dana, Gaillard, Goldsborough, Gore, Harper, Horsey, Howell, Hunter, King, Lacock, Mason of New Hampshire, Morrow, Roberts, Talbot, Tait, Thompson, Tichenor, Turner, Wells, and Williams.

Mr. WILSON observed, that he would not detain the Senate long, as he saw they were impatient for the question; but he felt it a duty to the prudent and economical State which he in part represented, to state his objections to the bill now before the Senate. This he should do as briefly as possible.

In the first place, he disliked its retrospective operation, in going back more than a year to give an additional reward for services already rendered, and in many instances paid for. This principle he thought objectionable in itself, and dangerous as a precedent.

The time at which the bill was brought forward, was another serious objection. Just at the close of a very expensive war, when many of the internal taxes and high impost duties are yet continued, to enable the Government to meet the demands upon the Treasury—while numerous and extensive claims for articles furnished, and services rendered, are yet unpaid and unliquidated—and while our revenue system is unsettled, and its productiveness unknown—he could not believe this to be the proper period for increasing salaries, either of ourselves or others. We ought at least to wait until those taxes are repealed, those claims discharged, and that revenue ascertained, before we thought of augmenting the compensation of members of Congress or officers of the Government.

He was also, Mr. W. said, displeased with the mode adopted in this bill. An annual salary to legislators, who sometimes sat longer, and sometimes shorter, was a novel principle, and its effects very doubtful. It might produce an injurious haste in the transaction of business—it might shorten the term, or lessen the frequency of the sessions of Congress—and, on the whole, appeared to him less safe than the per diem provision.

The amount contemplated by the bill he deemed too large. It would nearly or quite double the allowance which former Congresses had deemed sufficient, and under which present members had accepted their seats. It was a greater sum than many important officers under the General Government received for incessant service—and more than many of the States give to their principal officers. In New Jersey, not a single officer, excepting only the Governor, received a salary to this amount. The Judges of the Supreme Court, selected for their talents, experience and integrity, from amongst our best and wisest citizens, and engaged, with little intermission, during the whole year in their arduous and important duties, received far less compensation than is here provided for members of Congress, who are employed in public business less than half the year.

The precedent, Mr. W. said, he regarded as a very pernicious one. Raising our own pay, will be but an entering wedge to increasing the compensation of officers of the Government generally, civil, judicial, military, and naval. Though our charity begins at home, it will not be permitted to end here. This consequence he should deprecate. He did not consider high salaries consistent with the principles or safety of our Republican institutions—inasmuch as they tended to introduce, or to increase, ambition, intrigue, and corruption.

The manner in which the bill was hurried through, was not, he said, in his opinion, less exceptionable than the bill itself. In the other House (if he might be permitted to allude to its course there) it was introduced one day, read and considered the next, and passed the third. In the Senate, postponement, commitment, and amendment, are all refused; and it is to be pushed through, by main strength, with a haste altogether unusual in cases so doubtful in their character, and so important in their consequences.

On the whole, Mr. W. said, he did most earnestly hope, for these and other reasons which might be enumerated, that the Senate would reject this bill.

No amendment having been agreed to, the President resumed the Chair, and the bill was reported to the Senate.

On motion, by Mr. SANFORD, to strike out of line 9, "three thousand," and of line 11, "fifteen hundred," it was determined in the negative—yeas 10, nays 23, as follows:

On the question Shall this bill be read a third time?" it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 22, nays 11, as follows:

THURSDAY, March 14.

Mr. ROBERTS presented the memorial of Matthew McConnell, and others, a committee on behalf of the surviving officers of the Pennsylvania line of the Revolutionary army, praying remuneration for their services, by which the independence and sovereignty of the United States were achieved and established, as stated in the memorial; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HARPER, from the committee to whom was referred the bill to limit the right of appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Columbia, reported it with amendments, which were read.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill, reported by a committee of the Senate, for the relief of John Holker. [The bill is to allow him the amount of certain loan office certificates destroyed by fire.] Mr. ROBERTS suggested grounds of opposition to the bill, on its merits and the importance of the precedent it might afford for claims to an indefinite amount.

Mr. WILLIAMS sustained the claim on its merits as deduced from the evidence, and the expediency of allowing a claim manifestly just, which would have been allowed without the intervention of Congress, but for a mere formality which had been omitted, &c.

This bill was postponed to Monday next, on motion of Mr. ROBERTS, after some conversation between Messrs. ROBERTS, WILLIAMS, WELLS, DAGGETT, TALBOT, and HARPER—in the course of which no decided opposition was manifested by any gentleman to the bill.

Mr. DAGGETT submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the committee appointed on so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to Finance and an Uniform National Currency, be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for an augmentation of the salaries of the Judges of the Supreme Court of the United States.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill concerning certain advances made for the public service by the city of New York; and on motion, by Mr. SANFORD, the further consideration thereof was postponed until Thursday next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrection, and repel invasion, and to repeal the laws heretofore passed for those purposes; and on motion, by Mr. VARNUM, the further consideration thereof was postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Monday next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to ascertain and establish the western boundary of the tract reserved for satisfying the military bounties allowed to the officers and soldiers of the Virginia line, on Continental Establishment; and on motion, by Mr. MASON, of Virginia, the consideration thereof was further postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Tuesday next.

On motion by Mr. MASON, of Virginia, the further consideration of the report of the committee to whom was referred the resolution relating to the claims of the officers and soldiers of the Virginia line, on State establishment, for bounty lands, was also postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Tuesday next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill entitled "An act for the relief of Gustavus Loomis;" and it passed to a third reading.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill entitled "An act authorizing and requiring the Secretary of State to issue letters patent to Andrew Kurtz," and on motion by Mr. ROBERTS, the further consideration thereof was postponed until Wednesday next.

On motion by Mr. CAMPBELL, the Committee on Finance and an Uniform National Currency, to whom was referred the petition of the Legislative Council and House of Representatives of the Indiana Territory, praying the suspension of prosecutions under the law laying a tax on domestic manufactures; and the memorial of John Redman Coxe, professor of chemistry in the University of Pennsylvania, were discharged from the further consideration thereof respectively.

The bill respecting the late officers and crew of the sloop of war Wasp, was taken up. [This bill proposes to allow twelve months' pay to the relatives of the officers and crew of the lost sloop of war, and also authorizes the distribution of fifty thousand dollars among the same, as a reward for the capture of the British sloops of war Reindeer and Avon.] The bill was amended, and ordered to be read a third time.

INDIAN AFFAIRS.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report of the Secretary for the Department of War, made in obedience to the resolution of the Senate of the 2d of March, 1815, in relation to Indian affairs, and the report was read, and is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, March 13, 1816.

In obedience to the resolution of the Senate, of the 2d of March, 1815, I have the honor to transmit the enclosed documents, which exhibit the general expenses of the Indian department, embracing annuities and presents; and the general and particular views of the Indian trade, called for by the resolution.

Nos. 1, 2 and 3, exhibit the amount of annuities due and payable, and the sums actually paid to the several Indian tribes within our limits; the presents made to them, and the general expenses of the Indian department, during the four years preceding the 3d of March, 1815.

In the sum exhibited as presents, is included a great quantity of provisions furnished the friendly tribes during the war, who, on account of their attachment to the United States, were compelled to abandon their country, and take refuge within our settlements. The same cause prevented their engaging in the chase, the principal source of their supplies in times of peace. The embarrassments produced by a state of war, prevented the regular payment of the moneyed part of their annuities, and in many cases rendered it impossible to discharge that portion which was payable in merchandise. This circumstance presented a strong inducement to furnish them liberally with those supplies which we had at command, and which were even more necessary to them than the merchandise which we were bound to furnish. It is, however, believed that these supplies have been swelled to an unreasonable amount, by extensive impositions, which have been practised upon the Government, in the issue of provisions to them, which renders it necessary to discontinue the practice, or to devise new and suitable checks to guard against their repetition.

The statements marked from A to Z, exhibit the state of the fund set apart for Indian trade, during the four years preceding the 31st of March, 1815. It appears from these statements, that from the commencement of the trade, to the 31st December, 1809, a loss of $44,538 36 had been incurred, and that during the period designated in the resolution, the sum of $15,906 45 had been gained, notwithstanding the loss of $43,369 61 from the capture of several of the trading posts by the enemy, during the war. These two items, forming the aggregate sum of $59,276 06, may be considered as the commercial profit of the establishment, during that period, which would give an annual profit of nearly $15,000. But the annual expenses paid out of the Treasury, in support of the establishment, exceed $20,000, which presents a specific loss of more than $5,000 annually. The difference in the result of the management of this fund antecedent to the 31st of December, 1809, from that which is exhibited in these statements, during the four years preceding the 31st March, 1815, is no doubt, in great degree, the effect of the experience acquired by the prosecution of the trade. It is probable, that a more intimate acquaintance with the nature of the commerce, a more skilful selection of the goods, and of the agents employed in vending them, and a considerable increase of the capital invested in it, will in a short time produce a small and gradually increasing profit, after defraying all the expenses incident to the establishment, which are now payable out of the public Treasury. Under the most skilful management, the profits cannot be an inducement for continuing the system now in operation. That inducement, if it exists at all, must be found in the influence which it gives the Government over the Indian tribes within our limits, by administering to their wants, increasing their comforts, and promoting their happiness. The most obvious effect of that influence, is the preservation of peace with them, and among themselves. The exclusion of all intercourse between them and the whites, except those who have the permission of the Government, and over whose conduct a direct control is exercised, has insensibly contributed to this desirable object.

The amelioration in their condition, desired by the Government, has continued to advance, but in so slight a degree as to be perceptible only after a lapse of years. If the civilization of the Indian tribes is considered an object of primary importance, and superior to that of rapidly extinguishing their titles, and settling their lands by the whites, the expediency of continuing the system now in operation, under such modifications as have been suggested by the experience already acquired, appears to be manifest. The success of such an experiment requires the exercise of all the influence which the annual distribution of annuities and presents, aided by that which must flow from a judicious supply of all their wants, in exchange for those articles which the chase, and the increasing surplus of their stock of domestic animals, will enable them to procure. This influence, skilfully directed for a series of years, cannot fail to introduce among them distinct ideas of separate property. These ideas must necessarily precede any considerable advancement in the arts of civilization, and pre-suppose the institution of laws to secure the owner in the enjoyment of this individual property; because, no man will exert himself to procure the comforts of life, unless his right to enjoy them is exclusive.

The idea of separate property in things personal, universally precedes the same idea in relation to lands. This results no less from the intrinsic difference between the two kinds of property, than from the different effects produced by human industry and ingenuity exerted upon them. The facility of removing personal property from place to place, according to the will or convenience of the owner, gives to this species of property, in the estimation of the huntsman, a value superior to property in lands, which his wants, as well as his habits, compel him annually to desert for a considerable portion of the year. To succeed perfectly in the attempt to civilize the aborigines of this country, the Government ought to direct their attention to the improvement of their habitations, and the multiplication of distinct settlements. As an inducement to this end, the different agents should be instructed to give them assurances, that in any treaty for the purchase of lands from their respective tribes, one mile square, including every separate settlement, should be reserved to the settler, which should become a fee simple estate, after the expiration of a certain number of years of actual residence upon, and cultivation of it. Perhaps an additional reservation of a quarter or half section of land to each member of such family, would add to the inducements, not only to make such separate settlements, but to the raising of a family. If measures of this kind were adopted by the Government, and steadily pursued for a series of years, while, at the same time, a spirit of liberality was exhibited in the commerce which we carry on with them, success, the most complete, might be confidently expected. But commerce with our Indian neighbors, prosecuted only upon a contracted scale, and upon the principles of commercial profit, would tend not only to diminish the influence of the Government with them, but would not fail entirely to alienate their affection from it. A period has arrived when the trade must be greatly extended, or entirely abandoned to individual enterprise. To reserve the trade in the hands of the Government, whilst the wants of the Indians are but partly supplied, would be to make them feel its influence only in their privations and wretchedness.

The right of the British Northwest Company to participate in this trade, independent of the will of the Government, is now at an end. The settlements of the lands ceded by the Creeks, in 1814, will exclude the Southern tribes from all intercourse with the Spanish ports in the Gulf of Florida. The preservation of peace with those tribes, as well as the execution of the plans which may be devised for their civilization, require that this intercourse should not be renewed. The great distance of some of the tribes in the Northwest Territory, and in the northern regions of Louisiana, from the settled parts of the United States, will probably make it necessary to permit the British merchant, from Canada, to participate in the commerce of those tribes, until more accurate information is obtained as to their situation and numbers, their wants, and their capacity to pay for articles of the first necessity. As this knowledge is gradually acquired, and the mode of conducting the trade better understood, the exclusion of foreigners from all participation in it may be safely effected. If the trade is to be continued in the hands of the Government, the capital ought to be increased to $500,000. The exclusion from all commercial intercourse with the ports in the Gulf of Florida, and the necessity of extending our trading establishments further to the West and the North, with a view to the ultimate exclusion of foreign participation in it, forcibly suggest the propriety of such an increase. This capital will probably be found greatly below what is necessary to supply the wants of the various tribes within our limits. The deficiency, it is believed, will be supplied by the Northwest Company, and by individual enterprise. At present, the Governors of our Territories are compelled to give licenses to trade with the Indians, to every person who can give security. The power of rejecting the application, on account of the character of the applicant, appears to be necessary. If the licensed traders were compelled to take an oath to observe the laws regulating Indian trade, it might aid in correcting the abuses, especially in vending spirituous liquors, which have too generally been practised by them. It is deemed expedient to establish a depot of merchandise at St. Lewis, or its vicinity, under the direction of a deputy superintendent, who should have power, in addition to supplying the regular and established trading houses, to deliver to persons of good moral character, who should be able to give security, any quantity of goods not exceeding $10,000, for which peltries, and other articles of Indian commerce, should be received in payment at a fair price and at fixed periods; or, that they should be sold by the Superintendent, on account of the purchaser. In the latter case, a premium, equal to the use and the risk of the capital, should be added to the price of the goods. This, as well as several other important ideas, are more fully developed in the communication of Governor Edwards, and of the Superintendent of Indian Trade, which are herewith communicated, marked R. and Z. Z.

In compliance with that part of the resolution which requires my opinion of the expediency of vesting the general management of Indian affairs in a separate and independent department, I have the honor to state, that an arrangement of that nature appears to me to be highly proper, if the commerce of those nations is to be retained in the hands of the Government. The only rational principle upon which it is considered necessary to place the Indian trade under the control of the War Department, is the necessity of relying upon it for the small military force which has hitherto been stationed at the different trading posts which have been established. This countenance and support could be given to the department to which it might be confided, with the same facility as if it still remained subordinate to the Department of War. The accounts of the Superintendent of Indian Trade are now returned to the Treasury Department, to which, so far, the Superintendent is accountable. The accounts of the agents of the Government for the several tribes in amity with us, are still returned, and settled in the War Department. From the payment of annuities to the various Indian tribes within the United States, a new species of jurisprudence has sprung up, which operates as a heavy tax upon the time of the Secretary of War.

All losses of property by American citizens, from the robberies, thefts, and depredations of those tribes, are to be remunerated out of the annuities payable to them. The evidence in all these cases is extra-judicial, and requires the examination and approbation of the Secretary before remuneration can be made. The presents which are made to them, the allowances to artificers settled among them by the Government, in fact, every disbursement of money connected with the Indian departments, except in the prosecution of trade with them, has to receive the special sanction of the Head of this Department. The duties incumbent on this officer, resulting from the control of the Indian department, are so multifarious, so impossible to be reduced within general regulations, that a considerable portion of his time is necessarily devoted to them.

The organization of the accountant's office is such as to render it impossible for that officer, by any human exertion, promptly to despatch the business which has been accumulating from year to year, until the mass has become so imposing as to render the legislative aid indispensably necessary to correct the evil.

The creation of a separate and independent department, to which all the Indian accounts, including those which are still settled in the accountant's office, will not supersede the necessity of modifications in the organization of that office. The changes which are deemed necessary to insure the prompt settlement of the accounts of the War Department, are respectfully submitted to the Senate, in paper marked A Z.

If a new department be formed, much of the miscellaneous duties now belonging to the Department of State ought to be transferred to it. The changes which ought to be made, in this regard, will obtrude themselves upon the attention of the Senate whenever the subject shall be considered.

It is believed that, at the present moment, no plan can be devised for carrying on the Indian trade that will be equally advantageous to the Indians, although it may be more economical to the public. This opinion is founded, in a considerable degree, upon the fact that those who have a competent knowledge of the manner in which this trade must be prosecuted, to be successful, are destitute of the capital necessary for the prosecution to the extent demanded by the wants of the Indians. The capital of those parts of the Union where those persons are to be found, is not sufficient for the purposes of commerce among themselves. It is exposed to no risks, and the profit is great; consequently, it will not be employed in commerce with the Indians. The risks to which capital will be subject, when placed in the hands of these enterprising traders, as well from their casual want of integrity as from the robberies and thefts of the Indians, will prevent the capitalists of the commercial cities from supplying them with the means of engaging in this commerce. The proposition to establish a depot at some point about the mouth of Missouri, for the purpose of supplying those who will be able to give sufficient security with such an amount of goods as will enable them to prosecute the trade to advantage, will, in a series of years, produce a number of persons skilled in the manner of carrying it on successfully, and create a capital in their hands, which will be probably continued in that channel, and eventually justify the Government in leaving it under judicious regulations, which experience will not fail to suggest, entirely to individual enterprise.

These views are substantially founded upon the conviction, that it is the true policy and earnest desire of the Government to draw its savage neighbors within the pale of civilization. If I am mistaken in this point—if the primary object of the Government is to extinguish the Indian title, and settle their lands as rapidly as possible, then commerce with them ought to be entirely abandoned to individual enterprise, and without regulation. The result would be continual warfare, attended by the extermination or expulsion of the aboriginal inhabitants of the country to more distant and less hospitable regions. The correctness of this policy cannot, for a moment, be admitted. The utter extinction of the Indian race must be abhorrent to the feelings of an enlightened and benevolent nation. The idea is directly opposed to every act of the Government, from the declaration of independence to the present day. If the system already devised has not produced all the effects which were expected from it, new experiments ought to be made. When every effort to introduce among them ideas of separate property, as well in things real as personal, shall fail, let intermarriages between them and the whites be encouraged by the Government. This cannot fail to preserve the race, with the modifications necessary to the enjoyment of civil liberty and social happiness. It is believed, that the principles of humanity, in this instance, are in harmonious concert with the true interests of the nation. It will redound more to the national honor to incorporate, by a humane and benevolent policy, the natives of our forests in the great American family of freemen, than to receive, with open arms, the fugitives of the old world, whether their flight has been the effect of their crimes or their virtues.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

HON. JOHN GAILLARD,

President pro tem. of the Senate.

THE COMPENSATION BILL.

The bill to change the mode of compensation of the Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress, was read a third time.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, said, he was ever reluctant to differ in opinion from the majority of the Senate—for such a difference of opinion seldom failed to impress him with doubts of the correctness of that which he entertained. But on this occasion he was compelled to oppose the measure under consideration. He regretted that he was not in his place to have stated his objection to this bill at an earlier stage of its progress, for he was aware that, to oppose it at this time, when the sense of the Senate had been fully ascertained and expressed—when its fate was to all appearance determined and known, and when no opposition to it could be availing, would expose him to the imputation of vanity or affectation, or perhaps to the suspicion of unworthy motives. But this consideration should not deter him from the discharge of his duty. He felt conscious of the rectitude and purity of his motives, and he believed other gentlemen to be actuated by similar motives.

He would prefer several modifications of the bill, but he had only one insuperable objection to it, which was that it was retrospective, and immediate in its operation. He considered it improper or indelicate (without meaning the least reflection upon any gentleman who advocated it) to vote money out of the Treasury into our own pockets. For all useful public purposes he was willing to impose taxes, and to vote money as liberally as any gentleman. But he considered the object of this bill to be of too mixed and doubtful a character to exempt its advocates entirely from the suspicion of interested and selfish motives. He was very far from imputing such motives to them. But it was not enough to do right. The Representatives of the people should so conduct themselves as to be above the suspicion of unworthy motives. He was no Jacobin, and he would never act or speak with a single eye to popular approbation and favor. But he respected the opinion of the people, as every public agent should do; and although he would not do wrong to obtain their good opinion, yet he would always act as far as he could, consistently with his duty, in such a way as to meet their approbation. For, in a Government like ours, particularly, it was in vain to pretend to despise or disregard public opinion. It was not only the tenure by which we held our places, but it was the basis of the Government itself. Take from the Government that support, and what was now order and beauty would become despotism, or anarchy and chaos. He should, therefore, always respect the opinion of the people, and endeavor to obtain their approbation, as far as he could without a sacrifice of public duty. He admitted that the compensation of the members ought to be increased. He thought it ought to bear the same proportion to the expenses to which members are now exposed that it did to their expenses when the law fixing the present rate of compensation passed; and he had no doubt that the people would approve such an increase, for he had great confidence in their liberality and good sense. But he could not vote for the bill to take effect immediately. He would move to amend it, so as to postpone its operation until the expiration of the term of the present Congress; but he understood that such a motion had already been made, and rejected. And, as he could not obtain that modification of the bill, he was compelled to vote against it all together.

Mr. CHACE also opposed the passage of the bill, on the grounds already taken against it. He could not consent to legislate in this manner. No person, he believed, had yet computed that the compensation hereafter to be given to the members of Congress would be less than ten dollars per day, while Mr. C. computed that it would amount at a fair average estimate to seventeen dollars and a half per day, for each day they attended. This Government had been many years in operation, and it was not till very lately that complaints had been made that the compensation of the members was insufficient. This, he said, was an unfortunate time for the discovery, while the public debt was unliquidated, millions of public accounts yet unsettled, many of the patriot soldiers yet unpaid, and taxes continued—was this the proper time to increase the pay of the members to so extravagant a height? Mr. C. was of the opinion that compensation of members ought to be increased, but it ought to be done with prudence and with reference to the justice of the case, &c. The passage of such a bill as this would be justly disapproved by the people. Mr. C. also objected to the bill because defective in its details. That the subject might be maturely considered, he moved to postpone the bill to Monday.

Mr. HARPER opposed the postponement, because it was not alleged that information was desired, or that the details of the bill were such as required a long examination to understand it. The subject of the bill was as well understood as it could be by a postponement of any length.

Mr. DANA also opposed the postponement. The only argument against it, he believed, was, that the passage of the bill would be unsatisfactory to the people. If the bill was proper in itself, and there was anything in this terror of the popular disapprobation, it was a strong reason why they should not pause so long as was proposed; for, if once seized with a panic on this question, the terror might perhaps by delay become extreme. If this bill were justly dissatisfactory to the people, he said, it might be a reason to pause; but, for his part, he should not like to return and tell his constituents that he was afraid to vote for this bill, lest it should be dissatisfactory to them. His constituents, he said, were not opulent, nor yet afflicted by poverty; they lived at less expense than gentlemen could here; but, he said, he should manifest no respect for their discernment, if he were to suppose they could not see why members incurred greater expenses here than were necessary at home. He should show little respect for their disposition, if he supposed that they wished that the men whom they chose to represent them here should degrade themselves in order to live upon the compensation allowed, or should sacrifice their private property in serving the public. It might be expected of the public agents to make sacrifices in times of great emergency and national difficulty; but it would be idle, in ordinary times, to call on public men to be patriotic to their own loss and injury. Although, he said, the people of the State which he represented were not as wealthy as they were in some other parts of the country, he trusted they were not afflicted with that poorness of spirit that they would deny their Representatives a due compensation for their services. He had no hesitation in saying, that the proposed rate of compensation was not too much for any man who was fit to represent the people and State whom he had the honor, in part, to represent; and, however delicate the inquiry, he would not enter into a contest with his constituents about the correctness of their selection in sending him here. On the whole, he said, he concluded that it was not only proper to increase the compensation of the members, but, being proper, that it would be popular to vote for the bill. In regard to Mr. Mason's objection that the compensation was to take place immediately, he said it would forever exist in regard to this body, some of whom must, whenever a question of change of compensation is agitated, vote on a question affecting their own emoluments. But, he proceeded to show, this was a question on which the people had themselves decided. The Constitution of the United States, when first submitted to the people, contained an article providing that no law varying the compensation of the members of Congress should take effect until an election should intervene; thus presenting the question now raised by the gentleman from Virginia, in relation to this bill. This question was thus presented in solemn form to the people. They did not accept the article, said Mr. D. It is therefore decided by the people, that the Congress may correctly increase the compensation of its members during the time for which they are elected, &c.

Mr. MASON said, in reply to one of Mr. DANA's observations, that he wished to put off the operation of this bill to the 5th day of March next, when at least a part of the Senate and the whole of the House of Representatives would have returned to the people, and would not, without re-election, derive any benefit from the bill, &c. As for those of the Senate who will remain in office beyond the 4th of March next, he suggested that those who chose might avoid voting on the question, under the rule which authorizes any member of the Senate to be excused from voting on a question in which he is personally interested, &c.

Mr. CHACE complained that his arguments on this subject had not been fairly met and answered, but that gentlemen had flown off to incidental or irrelevant points, &c. The gentleman from Connecticut had intimated that the people of his State were high-minded men; Mr. C. said they were also a people of steady habits; and he asked whether they would have ever consented to give to their public officers a compensation at the rate of seventeen and a half dollars per day?—at a rate of salary which, during the time of their actual service, would exceed that of the Vice President of the United States—which he computed thus: Congress would meet on the first Monday in December next, and tarry until the 4th day of March. The utmost term of that session would be three months, and it might be less. The compensation for that year would then exceed seventeen dollars per day. Would the people relish this? he asked; for, he added, when we legislate in our own behalf, we ought to have due reference to the opinion of the people, as far as connected with the principles of justice and reason. He had no objection to making the compensation somewhat greater, but he wished it to be clearly defined, and not larger, relatively, than the present compensation was when first fixed. On this bill, if it passed, he further said, would be founded demands for an increase of compensation from every person in public office within the United States—from every clerk, &c., at the Seat of Government. In this and other views he regarded the bill, in its present shape, highly inexpedient.

Mr. ROBERTS rose to defend his vote from the arguments of those opposed to the bill. He was duly sensible, he hoped, of the situation in which members of this House stood in relation to public opinion; but he knew not, on this subject, what public opinion was. This question was presented to him for decision without that light. There had been a feeling generally prevalent, as far as his information extended, that the present compensation of the members was not sufficient. It had been his conviction that it was better not to agitate this question at the present time; but the proposition had originated in the other House, which was at least as responsible to public opinion as this; and, believing it not objectionable in principle, he felt it his duty to vote for it. If it were an unpopular act, he said, its weight would fall on the shoulders of those who voted for it—it might occasion their removal from the public councils, by which it might be that the public interest might be promoted: if so, he was willing to make the sacrifice. The proposed amount of compensation was perhaps too large; with the ideas of this subject arising from his humble situation in life, had he had the direction of this question, he should not perhaps have fixed it so high; but, he considered the two Houses, on this question, like a jury much divided on the subject before them, but obliged to decide upon something. On the ground of abstract right, however, without regard to the House of Representatives, he considered it expedient to pass the bill: it might be improved perhaps in detail, but the principle he considered as correct. Whatever appealed to the honorable feelings of the members of Congress could not fail of exciting them to a more earnest discharge of their duty, than a rule of compensation which pays them for each day they attend the public service. As to the plea of the extravagance of the proposed compensation, he denied the fairness of the view in which it had been presented, as well as the correctness of the computation as to the length of the sessions. But not only the mere time of attendance in this House ought to be taken into view, but the interference of the duties of the station with their domestic occupations and arrangements. Mr. R. said he should contradict the character his habits and mode of life had given him, if he were to become an advocate for extravagance; but, on the other hand, he did not, nor did the people, desire to see members living here in a state of privation and suffering. If his views of this subject should be disapproved by the people, he was willing to retire from their service, &c.

The question was then taken on postponement, and negatived.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, then moved to recommit the bill with a view to amend it.—Negatived, yeas 9.

The question was then taken on the passage of the bill, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 21, nays 11, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barry, Bibb, Brown, Campbell, Condit, Daggett, Dana, Gaillard, Harper, Horsey, Howell, Hunter, Lacock, Morrow, Roberts, Talbot, Tait, Thompson, Turner, Wells, and Williams.

NAYS—Messrs. Chace, King, Macon, Mason of New Hampshire, Mason of Virginia, Ruggles, Sanford, Taylor, Tichenor, Varnum, and Wilson.

The question being then on the title of the bill, to change the mode of compensation of the members, &c.,

Mr. VARNUM suggested that the title of the bill would be advantageously amended by making it "a bill to double the compensation," &c.

Mr. DANA said, if the gentleman desired to move the amendment, that it was a legal opinion that the title of an act need not necessarily correspond with its contents.

No amendment being moved to the title, it was agreed to.

FRIDAY, March 15.

Mr. ROBERTS presented the petition of Ferdinando Fairfax, of the City of Washington, in behalf of himself and others, praying the renewal or extension of certain patents granted to William Thornton, for inventions in and applicable to steam navigation, for reasons stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the committee to whom was referred, on the 11th instant, the bill for the relief of the widow and children of Robert Fulton, deceased; to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the report of the Secretary at War of the 7th instant, made in compliance with the resolution of the Senate, of the 30th of January last, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, with instructions to inquire into the expediency of authorizing, by law, the filling up and preserving complete, by enlistment, the Military Peace Establishment of the United States, as now fixed by law.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to limit the right of appeal from the circuit court of the United States for the District of Columbia, together with the amendments reported thereto by the select committee, and having agreed to the amendments, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House accordingly, and on the question, "Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time?" it was determined in the affirmative.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill dividing the State of Pennsylvania into two judicial districts; and, on motion by Mr. ROBERTS, the consideration thereof was further postponed to Tuesday next.

The bill entitled, "An act for the relief of Gustavus Loomis," was read a third time, and passed.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States," in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

On motion by Mr. BIBB, the bill was read the second time, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Finance and an Uniform National Currency.

Mr. BROWN, from the committee to whom was referred the bill further extending the time for issuing and locating military land warrants, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill concerning the District of Columbia; and, on motion by Mr. ROBERTS, the consideration thereof was postponed to Thursday next.

THE JUDICIARY.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of the following resolution, submitted yesterday by Mr. DAGGETT, viz:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for an augmentation of the salaries of the Judges of the Supreme Court of the United States.

On this subject there was some discussion as to the proper mode of procedure; in which Messrs. ROBERTS, DAGGETT, TALBOT, MASON, of New Hampshire, BIBB, LACOCK, and BROWN, took part.

On motion of Mr. MASON of New Hampshire, the District Judges were added to this motion.

Mr. ROBERTS moved to amend the resolve, by adding also "the Attorney General of the United States."

Mr. TALBOT desired to embrace also the Heads of Departments and Foreign Ministers, whom he thought still more inadequately compensated than the judges, &c.

In the course of the debate, the expediency of increasing the salaries of the judges, and also of the great officers of Government, was not distinctly questioned, but rather generally admitted. It appeared, however, that a committee had been appointed, some time ago, to inquire into the expediency of increasing the salaries of the officers of the Government generally. It having been suggested that the committee already appointed had this subject before them—

On motion of Mr. DAGGETT, the further consideration of the resolve was postponed to Monday week.

PAYMENT FOR PROPERTY LOST, &c.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of the bill from the House of Representatives, authorizing the payment for property lost, captured or destroyed in the service of the United States.

The bill has been much amended, and indeed essentially changed in all its features, since it came into the Senate.

As it was last reported from a select committee it proposes the appointment of a board of commissioners, at the Seat of Government, to sit on and finally decide all claims of the character embraced by the bill.

An amendment moved by Mr. MASON of Virginia, to appoint commissioners to collect evidence, arrange and report it to Congress (but not to decide upon it) was debated at considerable length; being zealously opposed by Mr. TALBOT, and also by Messrs. TAYLOR, DAGGETT, and FROMENTIN, and supported by Messrs. MASON, of New Hampshire, and DANA. It was finally negatived.

The bill was further considered, and the amendments first above described were agreed to. The time for exhibiting claims is limited to two years.

The bill provides for cases of losses of property under contracts with the Government, as well as by impressment, &c.

Mr. MASON, of New Hampshire, moved to strike out the word "contract."

This motion gave rise to some debate. It was supported by the mover, Messrs. ROBERTS, and DAGGETT, on the ground that it would subject the United States to pay for losses the risk of which every individual in making contracts must have taken into consideration, and regulated his contract accordingly. The motion was opposed by Messrs. BROWN, BARRY, LACOCK, and TALBOT, on the ground that there were many cases in which wagons, teams, boats, &c. are employed in services, the nature and danger and risk of which the commanding officer of an army would be criminal in making public, &c. And in such cases, where the United States imposed conditions not understood or anticipated, equitable remuneration for loss ought to be made, &c.

Before the decision of this question, it was superseded by a motion to strike out the whole section in which it stood.

The further consideration of the bill was then postponed to Monday, to which day the Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, March 18.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of John Johnson, and others, owners of an establishment for the manufacturing of woollen cloth in the State of New Jersey, praying the patronage and protection of Government, for reasons stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Message of the President of the United States, of the 9th instant, transmitting a statement of the militia of the United States, according to the latest returns, be referred to the Militia Committee, with instructions to devise and report such provisions as may be necessary and expedient to insure the annual returns of the militia of the several States, now required by law, to be made by their respective Adjutant Generals, to the War Department of the United States.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill entitled "An act for the relief of certain claimants to lands in the district of Vincennes;" a bill entitled "An act for the relief of Erastus Loomis;" also a bill entitled "An act to alter the times of holding the circuit and district courts of the United States for the district of Vermont;" in which bills they request the concurrence of the Senate. They have also passed the bill, which originated in the Senate, entitled "An act relative to evidence in cases of naturalization," with amendments, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments to the bill last mentioned; and, on motion by Mr. HORSEY, the further consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

The three bills last brought up for concurrence were read, and passed to the second reading.

The bill to limit the right of appeal from the circuit court of the United States for the District of Columbia, was read a third time, and passed.

The engrossed bill respecting the late officers and crew of the sloop of war Wasp, was read a third time, and passed.

The Senate resumed the motion made the 15th instant, for referring the report of the Secretary of War of the 7th instant, to the Committee on Military Affairs; and, on motion by Mr. WILSON, the further consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

The bill to provide for the indemnification for private losses of property employed in the public service, in its amended shape, (going to constitute a board of commissioners to audit and settle claims of this description,) was further amended, and at length ordered, with its various amendments, to be read a third time.

The Senate resumed as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrection, and repel invasion, and to repeal the laws heretofore passed for those purposes, together with the proposed amendment; and on motion, by Mr. WILSON, the consideration thereof was further postponed until to-morrow.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill entitled "An act making further provision for military services during the late war, and for other purposes," and on motion, by Mr. TALBOT, the consideration thereof was further postponed until to-morrow.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill for the relief of John Holker, formerly Consul General of France to the United States; and on motion, by Mr. ROBERTS, the consideration thereof was further postponed until Thursday next.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on Military Affairs on the petition of the representatives of Ignace Delino; and on motion, by Mr. BARBOUR, the consideration thereof was further postponed to this day fortnight.

On motion, by Mr. CHACE, the bill entitled, "An act to alter the times of holding circuit and district courts of the United States, for the district of Vermont," was read the second time, by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and passed to the third reading.

On motion, by Mr. MORROW, the committee appointed on the memorial of the Legislature of the Mississippi Territory, was instructed to inquire into the propriety of authorizing the Legislature of the State of Ohio to dispose of so much of the reservation of six miles square, in the county of Jackson and State aforesaid, as may be necessary for a site to a town convenient for a seat of justice in the said county; with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill further extending the time for issuing and locating military land warrants, and for other purposes; together with the amendments reported thereto by the select committee; and the amendments having been agreed to, the PRESIDENT reported the bill to the House accordingly; and on the question "Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time?" it was determined in the affirmative.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution to amend the Constitution of the United States, so as to regulate the mode of choosing Representatives in Congress, and Electors of President and Vice President thereof; and on motion, by Mr. WILSON, the consideration thereof was further postponed until Wednesday next.

Mr. HORSEY submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the committee appointed on the resolution of the Senate of the 29th ultimo, relative to private banking associations in the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire whether it be expedient and proper to provide for the more effectual payment of specie by the several banks in the said District.

On motion, by Mr. LACOCK, the committee to whom was referred so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to roads and canals, was instructed to inquire into the expediency of laying out a national or military road from the town of Washington in Pennsylvania, to Sandusky Bay, passing through Charlestown in Virginia, Cadiz, New Philadelphia, and Wooster in the State of Ohio.

THE JUDICIARY.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolve proposed by Mr. SANFORD, embracing an amendment to the Constitution, to make the judges removable from office on the vote of two-thirds of both Houses of Congress, with the consent of the President, &c.

Mr. SANFORD proposed to refer the resolve to a select committee; but, subsequently, Mr. DAGGETT moved to postpone it to Wednesday.

In the conversation respecting the mode of disposing of this business, some general remarks were made, of a decided character, by Mr. KING, against the object of the resolve, on the ground of its proposing to invade the independence of the Judiciary, so all-important and sacred a part of our Constitution, that the Legislature ought not even to propose to disturb it. Mr. ROBERTS and Mr. SANFORD, in reply, took ground against Mr. KING's doctrine, which they argued placed the judges on an eminence more exalted than was consistent with the genius of our Government or the extent of our Constitution, &c. This debate incidentally arose, and may be considered as merely breaking ground preliminary to the discussion which may take place on this question, if it is discussed at all. Mr. FROMENTIN also strongly protested against interfering with the Judiciary, forcibly remarking that blood followed from every the slightest wound inflicted on that valuable institution, &c.

The further consideration of the subject was postponed to Monday.

TUESDAY, March 19.

The bill entitled "An act for the relief of Erastus Loomis," was read the second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The bill entitled "An act for the relief of certain claimants to lands in the district of Vincennes," was read the second time, and referred to the committee appointed the 7th December, on the memorial of the Legislature of the Mississippi Territory.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion, made the 18th instant, for referring the Message of the President of the United States, of the 9th instant, transmitting a statement of the militia of the United States, to the Militia Committee; and agreed thereto.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill dividing the State of Pennsylvania, into two judicial districts; and on motion, by Mr. LACOCK, the consideration thereof was further postponed until Thursday next.

MILITARY SERVICES.

The bill from the House of Representatives making further provision for military services during the late war, and for other purposes, being taken up,

Mr. WILSON offered the following amendment as a fourth section to the bill:

Be it further enacted, That donations of land be granted to all the officers of the regular army who have been disbanded as supernumeraries, either in consolidating regiments or corps during the late war, or in reducing the army conformably to the act of March the third, one thousand eight hundred and fifteen, as follows, to wit: to each major general, one thousand two hundred and eighty acres; to each brigadier general, one thousand one hundred and twenty acres; to each colonel and lieutenant colonel, nine hundred and sixty acres; to each major, eight hundred acres; to each captain, six hundred and forty acres; to each subaltern, four hundred and eighty acres; and to officers of the medical and other staff, who have no rank, in proportion to their pay, according to the scale aforesaid.

The amendment being read,

Mr. WILSON observed that, on a subject which had so long been the theme of reflection and discussion, he did not intend to take up much of the time of the Senate. He would merely observe that he thought the allowance contemplated by this amendment to the disbanded officers of the late Army, was required by justice, inasmuch as their pay was, at best, insufficient to meet the extra expenses to which they had been subjected during the late war, in travelling from one post to another, and in living on the frontiers. As their pay had been often long delayed, and payment, at length, frequently made in depreciated currency, that good policy demanded this allowance, as it would, in a considerable degree, satisfy a very numerous meritorious class of men, who now thought their services and sacrifices had been poorly rewarded by their country; as it would have a beneficial effect, in case of a future war, upon the young and enterprising who might be inclined to enter the military service—who would see that they would not be turned off at the close of the war without any acknowledgment or reward; as it would be the means of forming a military barrier on our frontiers, against the incursions of the savages, and against invasions by the Mississippi or the Lakes; and as it would induce many of the soldiers to retain and settle their bounty lands under the auspices of these officers. That this gratuity was sanctioned by precedents furnished at the close of the Revolutionary war, and on the disbandment of the Army in 1800; and that public opinion, so far as it could be collected, called for this, or some other expression of the national gratitude to the disbanded officers, &c.

Mr. BROWN declared himself in favor of the principle of the amendment, but thought a discrimination ought to be made between those officers who had rendered essential service, and such as had done little or nothing. Some, he observed, had been in service many years, and were now turned out, with habits which prevented them from resorting to any kind of business for a support; while others had never seen an enemy, nor made sacrifices of any kind. He did not think it would be just to put all on the same footing; and, to allow time to make a discrimination, he moved a postponement of the bill.

Mr. TALBOT was against a postponement. The bill contained provision for the widows and orphans of militiamen, which it was highly important should pass with as little delay as possible; and he did not think it would be right to postpone the bill to introduce a provision incongruous with the provisions already contained in it.

Mr. WILSON replied that if the gentleman had read the bill through, he would have seen that the amendment offered was not incongruous with its provisions, as a part of the bill related to land bounties granted to soldiers of the regular army; and it could not be incongruous to introduce a provision concerning officers of the same establishment.

Mr. TALBOT explained, but declared himself still opposed to the postponement.

Mr. BROWN again spoke in favor of an allowance to such officers as had devoted their lives to the service of their country, and moved a postponement, to afford an opportunity of modifying the amendment so as to meet his views.

Mr. BARBOUR advocated the postponement. He could not vote for the amendment as it now stood, but was in favor of a liberal provision for those whose heads had been bleached in their country's service. If he were allowed time to prepare it, he would offer a section to provide for such as he deemed entitled to the munificence of the nation.

The bill was then postponed until to-morrow, without deciding on Mr. WILSON's motion.

WEDNESDAY, March 20.

Mr. TAIT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs to whom was referred the bill entitled "An act for the relief of Erastus Loomis," reported it without amendment."

Mr. SANFORD presented the petition of John

G. Gootsberger, of the city of New York, praying the allowance of the drawback of duties on certain goods and merchandise, as stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Finance and an Uniform National Currency.

Mr. WILSON, from the committee to whom was referred the bill entitled "An act in addition to an act to regulate the Post Office Establishment," reported it with amendments; which were read.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act making further provision for settling claims to land in the Territory of Illinois;" also a bill, entitled "An act to abolish the existing duties on spirits distilled within the United States, and to lay other duties in lieu of those at present imposed on licenses to distillers of spirituous liquors;" in which they request the concurrence of the Senate. They have also passed a resolution appointing a committee on their part, to join such committee as may be appointed by the Senate, to consider and report what business will demand the attention of Congress prior to adjournment; in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The two bills, and the resolution last brought up for concurrence, were read, and passed to the second reading.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the resolution to amend the Constitution of the United States, so as to subject the judges of all the courts thereof to removal from office; and on motion, by Mr. LACOCK, the further consideration thereof was postponed until Monday next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill entitled "An act authorizing and requiring the Secretary of State to issue letters patent to Andrew Kuriz;" and on motion, by Mr. ROBERTS, the further consideration thereof was postponed until Monday next.

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Finance and an Uniform National Currency, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill for the relief of the Baltimore and Massachusetts Bible Societies; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

MILITARY SERVICES.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill entitled "An act making further provision for military services during the late war, and for other purposes," together with the amendment proposed thereto, by Mr. WILSON, and on motion, the question to agree to the said amendment, as follows:

"Sec. — Be it further enacted, That donations of land be granted to all the officers of the regular army who have been disbanded as supernumeraries, either in consolidating regiments or corps during the late war, or in reducing the Army conformably to the act of March the third 1815, as follows to wit: to each Major General, one thousand two hundred and eighty acres; to each Brigadier General, one thousand one

It was determined in the negative—yeas 10, nays 15, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barry, Brown, Chace, Condit, Fromentin, Lacock, Macon, Ruggles, Sanford, and Wilson.

NAYS—Messrs. Barbour, Bibb, Daggett, Gaillard, King, Mason of New Hampshire, Morrow, Roberts, Talbot, Tait, Thompson, Tichenor, Turner, Varnum, and Wells.

Mr. BARBOUR then moved a new section to the bill, embracing a land bounty to disbanded officers of a certain class, (having intimated his intention, previous to the last vote, to move it.)

The bill was then postponed till to-morrow, without deciding on Mr. BARBOUR's motion.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution to amend the Constitution of the United States, so as to regulate the mode of choosing Representatives in Congress, and Electors of President and Vice President of the United States.

On motion, by Mr. LACOCK

"That it be referred to a select committee, with instructions to inquire into the expediency of proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, providing for the election of President and Vice President by the Electors of each State qualified to vote for the most numerous branch of the State Legislature:"

Mr. BARBOUR having stated his idea of a marked difference in principle between the two objects of electing Electors and Representatives; in which view he was seconded by Mr. LACOCK, and Mr. MASON of New Hampshire having remarked thereon—

Mr. BARBOUR said, that it was essential to the character of a pure representation, that the Representative should have a common feeling with his constituents; that he should know their wants and be possessed of their sentiments. Residence is part of the proper character of a Representative, who ought not to be placed at such a distance from his constituents that he can know neither their wants nor their feelings. The case is different with respect to the election of Electors, in respect to whom that personal knowledge is not necessary to their constituents. Not, Mr. B. said, that he would take the power of electing a President of the United States out of the hands of the people. God forbid, said he, that the power of electing a President of the United States should be lodged in any other hands than those of the people themselves. The whole Congress united, dictating a nomination, would weigh no more than a feather in the balance against the public will; any dictation in opposition to the public sentiment, would be considered as an outrage on the rights of the people, and justly scouted by them. The man who is chosen an Elector knows the sentiments, which he is bound to carry with him into the Electoral College, and which only it is his duty to express. The people emphatically elect the President; but those selected to express their will, may be chosen by general ticket without violating the representative principle. Mr. B. was, therefore, opposed to that part of the proposition before the Senate which embraced the Electors of President and Vice President. In regard to the inconvenience of laying out States into districts for electing Representatives, he said, he could not see the inconveniences suggested by the gentleman from New Hampshire, (Mr. MASON,) as it would occur but once in ten years. The advantages of an uniformity in the mode of election, he said, was obvious in regard to Representatives. It would put down all that manœuvring which would repress the sentiments of the people by a juggle, which, he said, was an inconvenience much greater than the labor of designating the metes and bounds of a district. In consequence of the elections by districts in the large States, and by general ticket in the small States, an undue preponderance had heretofore been given, Mr. B. said, to the small States in the councils of the nation. The general ticket for Electors had its origin in one of the Eastern States, to which we are indebted for many political ideas; it had been received with great opposition indeed, but, from self-defence, the Southern States had been most of them obliged to follow the example. Under the district system, Pennsylvania exhibited a melancholy spectacle; whilst the small Eastern States gave each many votes, the weight of Pennsylvania, great as she is, dwindled down to a solitary vote. Pennsylvania, which should have loomed in the horizon as large as any State in the Union, became invisible in consequence of the general ticket being resorted to. To regain her station in the Union, she was compelled to follow the example. Virginia, also, obliged by inevitable necessity, arising from the principle of self-preservation requiring her to counterpoise that system which had made its appearance in another quarter of the Union, reluctantly resorted to it. After some further illustrative remarks, Mr. B. said, in every point of view, he was now opposed to the districting the State for the election of Electors; whilst he considered the remainder of the proposition before the Senate as a recurrence to the true principles of the Constitution, which required that Representatives should be uniformly elected by districts. The representative body would then be that pure organ of the popular will in the National Councils, which the spirit of the Constitution intends it.

Mr. MASON, of New Hampshire, said, he had no disposition to enter into the controversy respecting great States and small States. He never had understood, however, that any State south of Virginia, had led Virginia into a change of the mode of election of Electors. According to history, as he had read it, Mr. M. said, Virginia was the first State that changed its mode of election; he knew of no State which had previously changed it. The Eastern States had made no change at all in that respect, having been uniform in adhering to one system. It was not of much importance, he said, who led and who followed; the question is, what shall be the remedy in future for the want of uniformity now felt? The gentleman from Virginia was desirous that the small States should be districted for the election of their Representatives—for what? That the people may express their will. Mr. M. admitted there was substance in this argument as to the great States, but not as to the small ones, in which every man proposed to their suffrage, by general ticket, was almost equally well known to his constituents, as if they were elected by districts. As to the election of Electors, and the observation that the voice of the whole Congress, united in favor of any man, would be but as a feather in the scale, Mr. M. said it was a feather which always had turned, and always would turn, the balance. He spoke not with reference to any particular transaction; but, let the Congress continue to make their nomination, the State Legislatures their nominations of Electors, and these two together would forever give a President to the United States. All the arguments of the gentleman in favor of electing Representatives by districts apply, but with much greater force, to the election of Electors; for here is the great pressure of danger; in this point, may it always be expected that an influence will be exerted over the people, which he said he knew no way of counteracting, but by putting each Elector within the sphere of the personal knowledge of those who are to choose him. With this view only did Mr. M. incline to favor this part of the proposition to amend the Constitution, which, if adopted, would make it more difficult that anything like dictation should be practised in the case of the election of Electors. The election of Electors by districts, would tend to take the power of appointing the head, the sole depository of the power of the nation, out of hands in which the Constitution endeavored to prevent its ever being placed. He was, therefore, favorable to that part of the motion before the Senate which related to the election of Electors. In the other clause of the proposed Constitutional amendment (relating to the election of Representatives) he saw no great advantage; he wished the practical evil under the present system to be pointed out. The States electing by general ticket, he said, were not more populous than some of those districts in the States choosing by districts, in which two, three and four members were for convenience elected. As long, Mr. M. said, as the States exercised the power they now possess (of selecting the mode of election) in a manner satisfactory to themselves, it would be unwise to interfere with it. Preferring himself to leave it where it was, he was opposed to that part of the amendment.

Mr. KING said that, so far as regarded the manner and time of choosing Representatives and Senators to Congress, a majority of the Congress may by law now establish the very manner of choosing Representatives, which was now proposed to be erected into a Constitutional rule. It seemed to him, therefore, unnecessary to alter the Constitution by imposing a rule, when, according to the Constitution, a competent power can now make the same regulation by law. Not so with that part of the amendment before the Senate, which the gentleman from Virginia proposed to strike out. The States may now severally direct the manner of choosing their own Electors; it is proposed that the manner shall be prescribed by the Constitution. This, Mr. K. thought would be an important change, and the only change suggested in the Constitution which he deemed an improvement. He thought he might venture to say, that if there was any part of the Constitution deemed by its framers and advocates to be better secured than any other against the enterprises which have since occurred, it was the very provision on the subject of elections to the Presidency. The idea was, that the action of that particular agency which has since controlled it, was as much displaced by the Constitutional plan of election of President and Vice President, as could possibly be devised. The opinion had been that all undue agency or influence was entirely guarded against; that the men selected by the people from their own body would give their votes in such a manner as that no opportunity would be afforded for a combination, to change the freedom and popular character which naturally belonged to the electoral bodies. Such had been the idea of the nation at the time of the adoption of the Constitution. We all know, said he, the course which this thing has taken. The election of a President of the United States is no longer that process which the Constitution contemplated. In conformity with the original view of the authors of that instrument, I would restore, as thoroughly as possible, the freedom of election to the people: I would make the mode of election uniform through the country, by throwing the whole nation into as many districts as there are Electors, and let the people of each district choose one Elector. One idea on this subject, he thought worth more than all the arguments against this course; that then all the people of the country would stand precisely on the same footing; and no particular addresses could be made to the special interests and particular views of particular men or particular sections of the country. The course now pursued in this respect, Mr. K. said, was not entitled to that high distinction. On the contrary, those who reflected on it could not help seeing that our progress in Government was not for the better; that it was not likely hereafter to be in favor of popular rights. It was with the people the Constitution meant to place the election of the Chief Magistrate, that being the source least liable to be corrupt. But if, under the name of the liberty of the people, said Mr. K., we put this power into other hands, with different interests, we place it in a situation in which the rights of the people are violated. In this point of view, to him (he said) this particular clause of the proposed amendment to the Constitution was of great value. Let the question of the mode of election of Senators and Representatives rest where it is; if Congress choose to interpose, let them. The other part of the proposition was in favor of the rights of the people, of the freedom of the country; for, with regard to these rights and freedom, no man could name a matter so important as the choice of the President of the nation. It is an infirmity in our natures that we look for chiefs and rulers, either for their superior virtue, or their supposed subserviency to the views of those in subordinate situations. It was against the evil of the latter principle, Mr. K. desired to guard. The liberties of the people, repeated he, of which we speak much, are more affected by the choice of President than by any other ordinary political act. In this point they are vulnerable; here ought the rights of the people and of the States to be guarded. Our existence and the passions of the present day are ephemeral; public liberty should be immortal. Considering that this body should be to the people and the States not only the safe guardians of their rights but the protectors of their liberty, he hoped they would adopt a provision he considered so nearly connected with the perpetuation of both.

Mr. BARBOUR said, he was not unaware that it was competent to Congress by law to regulate the mode of electing Representatives; but it seemed to him to be one of those important political principles which ought not to depend on the will of Congress. The Representative ought not, it appeared to him, to be the depositary of the power of regulating the mode of electing his successor. In regard to the Presidential election, which the gentleman from New York regarded as of paramount importance—our limited Magistracy, Mr. B. said, was not in his view in any degree formidable to the liberties of the people. The President must execute the public sentiment; when he departs from it, he from that moment dates his continuance in office. There was, Mr. B. said, a case on record in which a President had sought to carry on an administration in opposition to the public sentiment; he reaped his reward—one which, Mr. B. said, he hoped would attend all who should make the like attempt. All wise Governments look with more caution to those who represent the public will than those who execute it. It was a desideratum, Mr. B. said, that the purity and uniformity of their election should be fixed immutably as a part of the Constitution, beyond the control of the Legislature. The proposition of an amendment of this sort is an appeal to public opinion which may be safely made. Whatever may be the corruption (which God forbid!) which shall at any time pervade the Congress, they will always be restrained by an express provision of the Constitution; and, if this amendment be adopted, they will not have the power of regulating the mode of their own election according to their will or caprice. It was wonderful to him, Mr. B. said, that so important a question should ever have been left to the decision of those who were interested in it; and could be accounted for only by viewing it in the light of an experiment. He desired to see it placed on a surer foundation. In reply to Mr. MASON, who denied the force of the distinction in principle between the election of Electors and Representatives by a general ticket, he said, that in elections of Representatives by general ticket, men were frequently elected to Congress in that mode, who would not have been permitted by the people to represent the district for which they are elected. The Elector, on the other hand, is the mere organ of public sentiment, on a question in regard to which there is no sort of difficulty in ascertaining the will of the people. Mr. B. next spoke in reply to Mr. KING's remarks, in reference to the Presidential election. I would ask every member of the Senate, said he, whether any other sentiment has been expressed, or anticipation formed, in regard to this question than that the will of the people should be the rule of its decision? Will any gentleman undertake to say that any man could be elected Chief Magistrate of this nation who was not the choice of the people? The gentleman has suggested that it was intended, by the manner in which the Constitution is organized, that the Electors should come up to the Electoral College without any bias on their minds as to the character for whom their suffrage is to be given. Did the gentleman, as one of the makers of that Constitution, suppose that the minds of men, chosen for the purpose, would be wholly uninfluenced at the time they were called on to give their electoral vote? Is it possible or ought it to be, that their minds should be free from preference until the moment they are called on to put their ballot in the box? Such an idea is perfectly illusory and impracticable. The question must be decided by the people, (who are in this case the Grand Inquest,) who are the fit men to compete for this high station. If the Electors are to decide that question, after they enter on the performance of the electoral duty, they become the only source of election, and wholly deprive the people of this, which the gentleman conceives their most important right. The truth is, and must be so obvious as to be indisputable, that the Electors are only the organs of that public sentiment which has been long and unequivocally made up. Let us suppose the time ever to arrive, when an attempt shall be made to take from the people the election of their Chief Magistrate—could it succeed? Take the Congress and the State Legislatures, and throw all their weight together in one scale, and the will of the people in the other; those who oppose the people's will, at once will kick the beam. Why is it that the constituted authorities seem to have any agency now in nominating candidates for the Presidency? It is in homage to that popular sentiment of which they have the knowledge. Mr. B. said, he did not believe that all the Congress united, and all the Legislatures of all the States combined, could succeed against public opinion. There was, therefore, no danger to the liberties of the people from the present mode of electing a President of the United States. An important reason why a different rule of selection prevails in the case of Electors and Representatives, he said, was, that in the choice of the Re-representatives the people merely are represented; in the choice of Electors, the people and the sovereignty of a State are represented. If Electors were uniformly chosen by districts, a State—Virginia for instance—might have twenty-five Electors, and give but one vote; whilst Delaware, entitled only to three Electors, would, in the same election, give three votes—having an influence in the election, inversely proportioned to its comparative population, of three to one. It followed, he said, that unless the principle of a general ticket prevailed in the election of Electors, a State, possessing infinitely the greatest number of Electors, might, by a manœuvre or juggle, be deprived of its franchise on this great question.

Mr. MACON said, there was nothing more certain to his mind, than that the mode of election of Electors ought to be uniform throughout the United States; because, if it were otherwise, it was possible that a minority might elect the great officers of the United States. A small State, unanimous for one candidate, might by general ticket counterbalance the weight of two large States voting by districts. There was no way but by uniform district election, he said, to obtain with certainty the sense of the people. We have seen, in the history of this Government, the mode of election in some States change more than once. We must take people as we find them; and expect that they will change their mode of election when it is necessary to secure them their just weight in the Union. To guard against these changes in self-defence, or from political views, the only mode was to provide for an uniformity of election by districts. The difficulty in regard to districting States was not so great as had been represented. The State which he represented had, until lately, been in the habit of forming two sets of districts—the one for Representatives, and the other for Electors, and had not experienced much difficulty in it. Was it not better to surmount this small difficulty than to have different principles of election in different States? Of all the elections affecting the nation, none, he said, so nearly touched its great interests as the election of the great office of President; and if in any case the public voice should be heard more distinctly than another, it was in that election. What, he asked, had been recently done at this place, alluding to the nomination lately made? Do what we can, said he, we cannot get clear of this, which Mr. M. admitted to be an evil. But what had been the practice in States where the general ticket system prevails? A year before the election, frequently, do not these same States make a nomination of Electors? This is the consequence of the general ticket system, adopted from choice by some States, and followed by necessity from others. Although it were true, as had been stated, that Congress could regulate the mode of choosing Representatives, it was to put it out of the power of any party to change the mode of election to answer any particular purpose, that he would make an amendment to the Constitution in this respect, to prevent such changes as the States had made in the mode of electing their Electors. When parties are nearly balanced, they must be expected to calculate, so long as the power is with them, whether the change in this or that way will not give them the majority. Mr. M. said he had much rather see the question settled, and parties no longer geographical, as they would always be, if the system of general election continued to prevail. There were some States in the Union which had never changed the mode of electing Electors or Representatives. What, he asked, had been the consequence? No state of the country, no conduct of the Government, had produced in those States the least apparent change in their political complexion. The best interests of the country, in the opinion of Mr. M., required that both clauses of the proposed amendment to the Constitution should be agreed to; which would, as much as possible, put it in the power of the people to elect the men whom they prefer. A fair canvass never had taken place, nor ever could take place, in voting by general ticket, where the people, instead of having a personal knowledge of those for whom they vote, must take their characters on trust. Another reason for fixing an uniform mode of election by the Constitution, was, that at present doubts are entertained of the constitutionality of both modes of election, in the quarters of the country where they respectively occur, &c.

Mr. LACOCK remarked, that, from what had been said, there appeared to be a general opinion that there would be an advantage in bringing the question nearer the people. Why was it thought necessary that the people should have some knowledge of him whom they elect? That they might know him to be a faithful man, who would vote for the candidate whom they preferred. Now, Mr. L. said, he could see no reason why these agents should be employed between the people and their votes. If they were dispensed with, and the people in each State were to give in their votes, (as they do in several States for their Governors,) these votes to be returned to the State Executives, and by them to the General Government, there would be no occasion for the machinery of electoral colleges, and of course no difficulty in fixing an uniform mode of election. In this popular mode of election, Mr. L. said, there could be no fear of corruption. He knew, he said, that it would be objected that this mode of election would produce popular fermentation; but he denied it. Depend upon it, said he, that if ferment exists on this question, it will be excited by the officers of Government, and those connected with them; the people at home will remain unmoved, and on the day of election will, at their respective polls, soberly and dispassionately decide the question. Mr. L. then moved to recommit the resolution with instructions to report an amendment to provide for the election of President and Vice President by the Electors of each State qualified to vote for the most numerous branch of the State Legislatures.

Mr. HARPER said, as he might be called away by other business before this question was decided, he would take this opportunity of expressing his opinion, and his hope that the motion last made would not prevail, because it seemed to him that the principle it embraced was infinitely less expedient than that now on the table. It would have a tendency to produce more anomalies than now exist in the Constitution; to refer the election of President to a less certain rule than we have at present. It would induce a great deal of unnecessary trouble and vexation, and would at last come to the same result, as in the more simple and less embarrassing mode by the choice of Electors. As to the main proposition before the Senate, Mr. H. said, he was decidedly in favor of it, for this general reason; that its adoption would tend to make the elections of President less a matter of juggle and intrigue than they now are. He would not say that it would have the effect of wholly excluding intrigue, of placing this great election on the footing on which the great men who framed the Constitution vainly imagined they were placing it, of a free, unbiassed expression of the public will; but he thought it would bring it nearer than at present. Party arrangements and bargains would not be so easy. Bargains could not be so readily struck with one State for this great office, with another for that—he would not say as had been done, but certainly as may be done, according to the present mode of election. Districting the States for Electors, Mr. H. said, would, in his judgment, have a tendency to render the Presidential election more free and independent; to remove it more from the grasp of party arrangements; to prevent bargains between profligate agents, and the selling of the nation for offices to the highest bidder. He was, therefore, decidedly opposed to striking out that part of the proposition before the Senate.

On suggestion of Mr. DANA, Mr. LACOCK having so modified his motion as to divest it of its peremptory character, and make it a motion for inquiry merely—

Mr. DANA said, in that shape, he should vote for the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. He acknowledged that if Electors are to be pledged absolutely that they will give their votes for a particular person, he could perceive nothing but a solemn formality in the election of Electors, perfectly unnecessary. He knew not why these men should be interposed between the people and the candidates, that they may have an opportunity, not (under the practical construction of their office) of exercising their judgment in selecting the fittest men, but of playing some trick on the people. This was a subject, Mr. D. said, on which he had his doubts. As the views of the Convention on this subject had been mentioned, he said he would state, that he once had permission to examine the original journals of the Convention in the office of State; and it appeared that, in regard to the election of President, almost every possible mode had been tried and rejected. It was proposed at first that the election should be made by the National Legislature. This was agreed to, but afterwards reconsidered. It was then proposed that the President should be chosen by Electors elected by the several States: this was rejected. It was then proposed, and rejected also, that he should be chosen by the people. The real fact was, the Convention, in forming a government of which there was no model in history, had great difficulties to surmount. Projects of all kinds were tried, and none could succeed to their satisfaction, on this particular point. At length, after many fruitless votes on different propositions, a grand committee was appointed to consider the subject. They ultimately adopted the compound ratio which now exists, and added the feature of Vice Presidency to the system. In regard to the latter office, by way of illustrating its inutility, and the manner and motives by which it was disposed of, he referred to a historical fact from Grecian history. On an occasion in which a dispute arose among the allied Generals who had fought best on a certain campaign, and they could not agree—the question was decided by ballot, on which two names were to be inscribed; each General put his own name first, and all put that of Themistocles as second best. Since the amendment to the Constitution in regard to that office, Mr. D. said, he had considered the Vice Presidency as merely an item in the general market of intrigue. The person to fill it is always chosen, because he may otherwise be a formidable rival, or because he will be subservient to the views of those who hold the Presidency. Those who wield a party can, by means of that office, say to a powerful State, “here is your change; we will give you a Vice President if you will vote our ticket for President.” Whilst this was the character of that office, Mr. D. said, he would have none of it: he would not give as much compensation to a Vice President as to a President pro tempore of the Senate; for, in point of character, he considered it as one of the most trifling offices in the Government. So far as regarded the most certain mode of guarding against cabal and intrigue, the very circumstance of districting a State for ten years at a time, is that which would enable men to intrigue with certainty to a particular point. To guard with certainty against intrigue, the mode of election should be left uncertain. The whole plan of districting the United States, he said, was more completely adapted to the purposes of intrigue, bribery, and corruption, than any that had ever been devised. Believing thus, he must vote against it, not taking it for granted himself that mere change will prove a remedy to existing difficulties. The distinction between the two parties which formerly existed, Mr. D. took occasion to say, was now, or soon would be, merely nominal. Where was the difference between them now, he asked, except that those on one side had gone beyond the others, and the others had fallen a little back? There might be a nominal artificial distinction, but there was, in fact, but very little real difference. The general violence and error of party, he said, was purity itself, compared with the personal corruption that we have to guard against—the difficulty of preventing which will be increased rather than diminished by electing wholly by districts. Upon the whole, this was a subject requiring the most patient investigation, and in which a reliance on any general principles will totally deceive you. This is not the only instance in which the practical result may totally differ from that which you undertake to produce.

Mr. MASON, of New Hampshire, conceived the idea of Mr. LACOCK to be wholly impracticable. The qualifications of voters in the different States were so entirely different, that the whole election would be unequal in its bearing on the different States. One State has not, in some instances, according to its population, one-fourth of the votes which another State may give, &c. If there were no other objection to this new proposition, this would be of itself conclusive.

Mr. KING spoke to Mr. LACOCK's motion: All experience, he said, had shown that the people of any country were most competent to a correct designation of their first magistrate. So far as history affords us light, it leads to this point; that, in time of difficulty and peril to a nation, when it is in utmost need of superior talent for its high stations, no tribunal is more competent to discern and select it than the people. Intrigue, turbulence, and corruption, may have some sway in quiet times, when all is tranquillity in regard to the general situation of the country; but when the Ship of State is in peril and danger, turbulence ceases, and the best men are by an instinctive power fixed on by the people for their governors. That has been wonderfully illustrated by history; and the best designations of magistrates have been produced in this way. My sober view is, said Mr. K., that, as to the election of Chief Magistrate of this nation, nobody is so competent as the great body of the freemen to make a proper selection. Whether, on this question, their first impression should be taken, as now suggested by Mr. LACOCK, was, Mr. K. said, a question of great importance. There would be great difficulty in making the returns of the votes; those who collected and compared the votes might defeat the choice of the people, &c. Not, he said, that these objections were insuperable. He was persuaded that the course of things under the present mode of choosing a President was in its nature pernicious, and that it had a tendency to prevent the object intended by the Constitution, of a pure elective magistracy. Men now live, said he, who will probably see the end of our system of Government as we now go on: terminate when it will, that termination will not be favorable to public liberty. For five years past, Mr. K. said, he had seen a character developing itself, the predominance of which he feared. Not a people on earth, he said, were more capable of high excitement than this people. During the excitement of the passion to which he referred, if a contested election occurs, the gownsmen must stand aside; another character supersedes them; and there can be little difficulty in judging what will be the result. The march from military rule to despotism is certain, invariable. Those who think they see the probable tendency of our present system should interpose something remedial. The people in this particular are the best keepers of their own rights; and any device to remove that power from them weakens the security of it. Mr. K. said he was anxious that the Senate should come to this question without the feelings of party; it was one involving all their interests and those of their families and descendants. He knew, he said, that this proposition, if agreed to, would break down the power of the great States. He had no objection, if in curtailing their power, the same measure regulated the rights of the whole nation equally. He was willing to let the election for the Presidency rest wholly on the people. He was therefore in favor of the motion of Mr. LACOCK.

Mr. FROMENTIN said, that although in favor of the principle of the original proposition for an uniform mode of election, there was such a disposition to run away with the question, he could not but regret it had been proposed at all. It was now proposed to refer the election of Chief Magistrate of the United States to the people at large. He could not conceive how, in the spirit of the Government in which we live, it would be possible to ascertain the result of such an election. The honorable gentleman from New York had hinted at some of the possible consequences and difficulties of it. I am, said Mr. F., as fully persuaded as the gentleman from New York, that the people are the source of all power; that, as long as they are uncorrupted, their liberties are in no danger. In reference to the cases of ancient Republics, it had been said, that the people had never been mistaken in their choice, in the hour of danger, of a proper character for the Chief Magistrate. But, is our situation to be compared to that of those Republics? What were Greece or Rome to the United States? Although the choice there nominally fell on the people, it was on those of a few adjacent cities, who exercised the whole authority, and pointed out some man on the spot qualified for the exigency of the moment. Look at the vast expanse of our country, from Maine to Louisiana—no such election could here be made in case of emergency; before it could be consummated we should be devoured by the monster which threatened us. It is not possible to suppose such a state of things in this country, as that from which the gentleman has drawn his analogy. However the practice of electing Electors by State Legislatures might have prevailed, Mr. F. said he could find nothing in the Constitution which sanctioned what he should, with due deference, call this usurpation of power by the State Legislatures. There was but a single step from one usurpation to another, and it was time a just construction should be given to the Constitution. If no other good results from this discussion, but an uniform mode of election by all the States, the Senate would be abundantly compensated thereby for all the time they had consumed in the discussion of this subject. The officer to be elected was the officer of the whole community, as much of Massachusetts as of Georgia, of Connecticut as of Kentucky. Why then, should a different mode of election prevail in different States? Mr. F. examined the progress of elections under the present system. The Legislatures of some States may keep back their election until the day before the election of President is to take place, and may appoint Electors out of their own body too; and those Electors, having ascertained the opinion of other Electors, (which the Constitution, by fixing the same day for the election in every State, meant to guard against,) decide which ever way they can make the best bargain, or their interest inclines. It was with a view to remedy this and similar evils, which have existed and do exist, that he was in favor of the proposition to amend the Constitution, but against the motion to refer it.

Mr. HARPER suggested an additional objection to Mr. LACOCK's motion; that, in proposing that the election should be per capita, it threw out of view altogether the Federal principle by which the sovereignties of States are represented, as well as the people, in the present mode of election. This would break in upon the principles of our Government, and destroy, pro tanto, that principle of compromise which runs through every part of the Constitution. It would destroy that influence of the smaller States in the Presidential election, which arises from their representation of the sovereign characters of the States—and thus completely destroy a very important principle of the Constitution; taking from Louisiana, for instance, two-thirds of its influence in the election, from New York only one-fourteenth, &c. Such a mode of election would also produce much embarrassment, if not insuperable difficulty in carrying it into execution.

Mr. LACOCK thought that the objections urged might all be obviated or overcome. What, he asked, could make us so much one people, as to give to all the people this general equal privilege? It will produce in the national habits, manners, and love of country, more harmony than any other political measure which could be possibly adopted. If it would have that effect, it was the duty of every gentleman, Mr. L. said, so far to sacrifice his own views, as to let the resolve go to a committee, and suffer it to be examined whether or not it could not be divested of the objections of mere detail which had been urged to it.

Mr. BIBB said he was disposed, with the gentleman last up, to adopt any measure to inspire sentiments of nationality among the whole body of the people; but he would not accept those which would result to the benefit of one or two large States at the expense of others. In this respect, he concurred in Mr. HARPER's view of Mr. LACOCK's proposition. There was, perhaps, no provision of the Constitution which bore stronger internal evidence of having been the result of compromise than that now under consideration. What, if the last new proposition were to prevail, would be the condition of the slave-holding States? They would lose the privilege the Constitution now allows them, of votes upon three-fifths of their population other than freemen. It would be deeply injurious to them. Mr. B. said, however, he had no particular objection to commitment for the purposes of inquiry.

14th CON. 1st SESS.—8

Mr. BARBOUR said this last proposition contemplated not merely a change in the mode of election, but a revolution in the Government. This subject had now risen to a degree of importance far greater than it at first possessed. Had the petition come from any quarter of the United States, either from the State Legislatures or from the people, that this great change should be made in our form of Government, that the powers of the several estates or departments of the nation should undergo this metamorphosis, this destruction of the balance of power in the Confederacy? It had pleased God to give the Southern country a population anomalous, having the double character of person and property; other States had none such. Again, our great American family was divided into greater and lesser societies; meeting together to form a confederation for general welfare and security; a compromise of particular interests had taken place, which such a rule as was now proposed would violate and overthrow. Although this might be for the interest of the large States, said he, I, for one of the Representatives of a large State, utterly disclaim it; I will not touch the principle established by the Constitution. Seeing that no human ingenuity can provide a remedy for the evils of this project, should it succeed, I must vote against even a reference of it.

Mr. BIBB said, he was willing to see the details, though as averse to touching the principle of compromise in the Constitution as the gentleman last up. The relative weight of the States might perhaps be preserved. If it could, the best mode of obviating that spirit of intrigue which the election of a President always will generate, would be to carry the question to the mass of the people.

The question on Mr. LACOCK's motion to refer the proposed Constitutional amendment to a committee, with instructions to inquire into the expediency of so amending it as to refer the Presidential election in the first instance to the whole people, was decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bibb, Brown, Campbell, Daggett, Dana, Gaillard, Goldsborough, King, Lacock, Roberts, Sanford, Tait—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Barbour, Barry, Chace, Condit, Fromentin, Horsey, Howell, Hunter, Macon, Mason of New Hampshire, Mason of Virginia, Morrow, Rugles, Talbot, Thompson, Tichenor, Turner, Varnum, Wells, Williams, Wilson—21.

So the motion was negatived.

The question was then taken on Mr. BARBOUR's motion, to strike out the second member of the resolution, as follows:

"For the purpose of appointing Electors of President and Vice President of the United States, each State shall, by its Legislature, be divided into a number of districts, equal to the number of Electors to which such State may be entitled. Those districts shall be composed of contiguous territory, and contain, as nearly as may be, an equal number of inhabitants, entitled, by the Constitution, to representation. In each district the persons qualified to vote for Representatives shall appoint one Elector, and no more. The

It was determined in the negative—yeas 12, nays 20, as follows:

On motion, by Mr. BARBOUR, that the further consideration of the resolution be postponed to the first Monday in July next, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 18, nays 14, as follows:

THURSDAY, March 21.

The bill, entitled "An act to abolish the existing duties on spirits distilled within the United States, and to lay other duties, in lieu of those at present imposed on licenses to distillers of spirituous liquors," was read the second time, and referred to the Committee on Finance and an Uniform National Currency.

The bill, entitled "An act making further provision for settling claims to land in the Territory of Illinois," was read the second time, and referred to the committee on the memorial of the Legislature of the Mississippi Territory.

The resolution from the House of Representatives, for the appointment of a joint committee on the subject of an adjournment of Congress, was read the second time.

The bill for the relief of the Baltimore and Massachusetts Bible Societies, was read the second time.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill entitled "An act making further provision for military services during the late war, and for other purposes," together with the amendment proposed thereto; and on motion, by Mr. TALBOT, the further consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill "for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions." This bill, in addition to the enactments contained in former laws, provides that in cases of neglect or refusal of the Governors or Commanders-in-Chief in each State, to call forth the militia, when legally required, the President of the United States shall be authorized to call upon any officer or officers having command in the militia, who shall forthwith comply with the requisition, and detach the men under their command.

After several unsuccessful motions to amend and postpone the bill indefinitely, Mr. MASON, of Virginia, submitted amendments for consideration, and the bill was postponed until Monday next.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the liquidation of certain claims, and for other purposes;" also, a bill, entitled "An act to repeal the act, entitled 'An act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government and maintaining public credit, by laying duties on household furniture, and on gold and silver watches,' in which bills they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The two bills last mentioned were read, and passed to the second reading.

POST OFFICE ESTABLISHMENT.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill entitled "An act in addition to an act to regulate the Post Office Establishment," together with the amendments reported thereto by the select committee. Mr. VARNUM was requested to take the Chair:

And on the question to agree to the 4th amendment reported, to strike out the whole of the 3d section, as follows:

"SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That letters and packets to and from any member of the Senate, or member or delegate of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, the Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives, shall be conveyed free of postage from the commencement of every Congress until the termination thereof, and for thirty days thereafter: Provided always, That no letter or packet shall exceed two ounces in weight."

It was determined in the affirmative—yeas 22, nays 11, as follows:

But this remedy shall not be used by any bank, or bank agent, as a remedy against another bank.]

INCREASE OF SALARIES.

Mr. FROMENTIN, from the committee to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill providing for the increase of the salaries of the officers of Government therein mentioned, and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

The report and bill are as follows:

The committee appointed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the salaries of all the officers of Government, beg leave to report—

That, from the most thorough investigation by them bestowed on the subject referred to them, they can have no hesitation in recommending an increase of salary to all the officers of Government mentioned in the bill which accompanies, and which they pray may be considered as part of this their report. By contrasting the prices of all the necessities of life at the time at which the salaries of the officers of Government were first fixed with the prices now to be given for the same necessary articles, your committee are satisfied that the expenses of living have been increased in a proportion much greater than the increase contemplated in the bill now submitted to the Senate. At the same time, therefore, that they were persuaded an addition was to be made to the salaries of the officers of Government, they entertained doubts as to the amount of augmentation which it might be proper for them to recommend, having a due regard both to the necessities of the officers to be provided for, and to the principles of a wise and prudent economy. From these doubts your committee feel themselves relieved by the principle of augmentation established in the act lately passed to change the mode of compensating the members of Congress.

From the year 1790, when the Government first went into operation, to the end of the thirteenth Congress, it appears, by a reference to the journals, that Congress have been in session four thousand one hundred and forty-eight days; which number of days, divided by twenty-six, the whole number of years which have elapsed from the beginning of the first to the end of the thirteenth Congress, gives for each year an average number of one hundred and fifty-nine days and a fraction during which Congress have been in session, without making any mention of the additional number of days during which the Senate have been occasionally called upon to sit on Executive business.

Had the compensation of members of Congress then been, as it now is, at the rate of $1,500 per annum, instead of six dollars per day, they would have received nine dollars and a fraction, making the increase to their salary, as fixed by the act to change the mode of compensating the members of Congress, about fifty per cent. over the sum at which it was originally fixed in the year 1790; an increase, however, still reduced somewhat below fifty per cent., as no alteration has taken place in the mileage.

Fifty per cent., then, being about the increase made by Congress to the compensation of their own members, may be fairly considered as the standard by which the salaries of the officers of Government ought to be now regulated; and the committee would have reported to you a resolution to that effect, had there been no occasional increase of salary to some of the officers whose compensation was originally fixed in the year 1790, and had there not been several offices created since with rather more adequate salaries.

These circumstances preclude, on the part of the committee, the possibility of a compliance with a strict adherence to the principle of increase in every case in absolutely the same exact proportion. Your committee were further induced to sacrifice unimportant fractions to the advantage resulting from adopting a mode of compensation amounting to a round sum. With this view of the subject referred to them, and without losing altogether sight of the principle adopted by Congress in the act providing for the increase of their own compensation, your committee beg leave to add, that, except in a few cases, where, from the considerations above mentioned, they have reported below the increase of fifty per cent., they have rather generally gone beyond than remained below the principle of an increase of fifty per cent. to the salaries as they were originally fixed in the year 1790.

A Bill providing for the increase of the salaries of the officers of Government therein mentioned.

Be it enacted, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, in lieu of the salaries formerly allowed to the officers of Government mentioned in this act, there shall be allowed to them from the 1st

THE NATIONAL BANK BILL.

The bill from the House of Representatives to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States, was taken up as in Committee of the Whole. The first section having been read—

Mr. CAMPBELL stated, as chairman of the Committee of Finance, that whilst this bill was before that committee, amendments had been proposed to it, but, though a majority of the committee had been of opinion that the bill required amendment, as they did not entirely concur as to the nature of the amendments, they had determined to report the bill without amendment. He was one, he said, who considered the bill defective. It had been his intention to have this day submitted his views of the bill, and to have moved amendments to it accordingly; but the state of his health would not permit him at this time to perform that duty. He should therefore leave the bill to be disposed of by the Senate in such way as the Senate might think proper, reserving to himself the right at some future moment to give his views of the bill, &c.

Mr. MASON, of New Hampshire, moved to strike out five, the proportion of specie to be paid in at the time of subscription, and in lieu thereof to insert ten; the effect of which motion would be to make the whole amount of specie paid in at the time of subscription $2,800,000, instead of $1,400,000. The two great objects proposed by the friends of this bill, he said, were—1st, to release the country from the mass of spurious paper which was said to be the circulating medium; 2dly, to aid the Government in its finances. To effect the first object, the bank must commence its operations in specie. To enable it to do this, he proceeded to show, that in his view a larger proportion of specie was necessary to the first payment. The United States stock subscribable and payable at the same time, to the amount of seven millions, would, he said, be no more aid to the bank in discounting with a view to redeeming its notes with specie, than would so many bank bills. The amount of $1,400,000 in specie, divided among the different branches which he presumed would be immediately established, would, he argued, be insufficient for any operation whatever. Let the bank issue paper sufficient to produce any effect, and the specie in its vaults would be instantly withdrawn from them; twenty-five days would be sufficient for that purpose. In Baltimore, Philadelphia, and the District of Columbia, he said, the notes of the bank would be seized on by every individual who has any occasion for specie, &c.—the bank, then, to be safe, would be able to issue no more paper than to the amount of its specie paid in. Would such an issue, he asked, serve to reform the currency, or give the Government any aid in its finances? It might be said, the bank would commence operations slowly and with caution; but, Mr. M. said any man acquainted with the institution of banks knows that the sum first paid in is nearly all that the stockholders ever pay. The bank would continue in operation forever, he said, without taking from the stockholders any considerable sum more than the first instalment; for, as far as the bank discounted, the second instalment would be paid into the bank with specie of the first instalment, &c. This was a position so fully supported by all experience, that he presumed it would not be denied. For its specie capital, then, the bank must depend principally on the amount first paid in: the bank might sell some stock, &c., to obtain specie, but the direct bringing in of specie would not be much after the first instalment. The sum of $2,800,000 was not a large instalment to be first paid in on a capital of thirty-five millions, and, according to the statements of gentlemen, there would be no difficulty in obtaining the necessary amount of specie to make the first payment. He concluded by saying that his motion, if adopted, would essentially aid the bank in commencing its operations, and increase its effect in reforming the circulation of the country, as far as this bill can have that effect.

Mr. KING, of New York, supported this motion. Before he proceeded to make any remarks on the motion, he touched upon a question preliminary in its character, and which he regarded as of great importance, inasmuch as it superseded all detail, and, if decided affirmatively, rendered it utterly useless to discuss the details of the bill. Adverting to the discussion which had taken place in this House on late occasions in regard to public opinion, he said that public opinion, well defined and understood, the well considered judgment of the majority of the nation, no one doubted, was entitled to profound respect from this House. Public opinion, he said, was not so embodied, not cast into such a shape, that much confidence could be placed in that argument on the subject of the establishment of a National Bank. Yet, he said, public opinion does exist; and where it is relative to Constitutional questions of great municipal law, it may be relied on as authority. The Legislative power of the nation was placed in two separate branches; public opinion in favor of this distribution of it was so general and strong that no educated man in the nation could doubt it. It was, therefore, not only a provision of the Constitution, but unquestionably the decision of public opinion, that, upon any measure fit to be made a law, the discussion on all its provisions ought to be subjected to separate examination in the separate branches of the Legislature, and that the decision of one branch should not operate to preclude a re-examination by the other; that each branch of the Legislature should deliberate on any measure which has passed the other branch, with the same freedom as if the bill had originated in that House. The subject now under consideration, Mr. K. went on to say, was a most important measure, and had passed the other branch of the Legislature. Those very considerations, rather than forbidding, demanded a peculiar and circumspect examination of the bill in this branch of the Legislature. It may, for example, have fortuitously passed the other House. Care ought to be taken that it do not in like manner fortuitously pass the Senate. The smallness of the majority in the other House, the possibility of its varying, &c., instead of being reasons for hurrying over this bill, were reasons why it should be examined more freely. If this reasoning were not true, the Constitution and public opinion were equally wrong; the Legislature should consist of but one branch. He was not, therefore, permitted to doubt, he said, that the Senate, disregarding the suggestion, that possibly the bill might fail on being again brought before the other House by amendments from this House, would decide according to the obligations of their stations here, and with an unbiassed regard to their fitness on such amendments as should be proposed; leaving the responsibility for the consequences of a performance of their duty, where, by the Constitution, it ought to rest. These suggestions flowed from an apprehension on the part of Mr. K., that, although the question was surrounded with difficulties, the Senate would be urged to pass the bill without amendment, lest, on its return to the House, if the Senate did its duty by amending it, the bill would fail. Mr. K. then turned his attention to the bill, which, he said, was imperfect in its provisions in the view which any gentleman might take of it, as could be easily shown. The particular proposition now before the Senate though important, he said, was not as much so as other points in the bill. But the gentleman from New Hampshire had conclusively shown that one and a half millions was the greatest extent to which, as it now stood, the bank could safely issue on a specie system. Illustrating his view of the subject by a detailed statement of the process, he said, that the first discounts of the bank being necessarily to those most pressed by the State banks, the proceeds of the discounts would immediately find their way into the vaults of the State banks, &c. Under this view, a million and a half of dollars would be a sum entirely too small wherewith to enter into competition with the existing banks. If the issues of the bank exceeded the specie paid in, the first process would be, immediately to transfer the specie from the general bank to the local banks; if the bank confined its discounts within that sum, its agency would be very limited indeed, &c. Connected with this subject, Mr. K. said, was another idea, which perhaps it would be premature now to enlarge on; which was, that according to the provisions of this bill, as he understood them, the bank need not, may not, will not, be a specie bank; the very circumstances already suggested would compel the bank to become a paper bank, to issue a paper that will not command specie. This, then, should be an additional motive to the Senate to increase the amount of the specie payment, that the bank may be enabled to avoid such a state of its affairs as would compel it to become a paper bank, &c. With these views Mr. K. hoped the Senate would agree to the amendment proposed.

Mr. BIBB, of Georgia, rose to oppose the amendment. Feeble as he was, he said, nothing less than the most imperious obligations of public duty could have brought him to the Senate. But, believing, as he did, that the adoption of any amendment whatever to the bill would certainly endanger or defeat its passage, and that upon its fate depended, more than on any other measure to which the attention of Congress could be drawn at this moment, the welfare and prosperity of the country, he felt bound, unmindful of the consequences, to make a great effort to aid, with his vote at least, the progress of the bill. He regretted exceedingly the physical incapacity which would prevent him from laying before the Senate at large his views of the question, which, however, he proceeded to assign as far as he was able. It appeared to him, he said, impossible for a statesman, in the habit of contemplating national questions, and considering cause and effect, not to look at the present condition of the country with apprehension and alarm. By a combination of circumstances not necessary to be enumerated, one of the leading objects of the adoption of the Federal Constitution was at this moment lost to the nation. Whether it should be finally lost to the nation, or should be recovered, would depend, in all human probability, on the conduct of the Senate on this occasion. To enable the Government to fulfil its engagements to the public creditors, to restore confidence among the citizens of the country in regard to pecuniary transactions, to prevent anything but gold and silver from being a legal tender, to maintain the obligation of contracts, were, he said, the leading objects which produced the adoption of the Constitution. The regulation of the general currency of the country, without which the attainment of these great objects is impracticable, is, said Mr. B., at this moment wrested from the hands of the Government by petty corporations and swindling individuals throughout the community. This, he said, is the abject condition of our affairs. Could any honorable Senator reconcile it to his conscience to leave his seat at the present session, without making an effort, a great effort, to reform the national currency, to regain the power over it which we have lost? The country was rich in resources, its people in individual means; and yet both the country, and individuals, were unequal to meet their engagements honestly and faithfully; and, not only so, but the Government was compelled to legalize that species of swindling by which the important, necessary power of sovereignty, the regulation of the currency of the country was taken from the Government. It was unnecessary, he said, to recapitulate the cause which had produced this state of things, but he did verily believe, that, unless the present Congress should take some efficient measure to compel the resumption of payment of specie, it was extremely doubtful whether it ever would be done. He called the attention of the Senate to the acts of the State governments; scarcely a session passed in which bank charters were not granted by them to the amount of millions—and, as the influence of these State banks increased, so did the difficulty of legislating on this subject. Mr. B. then considered the subject in other points of view. At the present moment, he said, the people in the Eastern States pay the revenue to the United States in Treasury notes; but the Secretary of the Treasury was making a great effort to call in that species of paper. When that object was accomplished, what would be the situation of the Eastern States? Whilst other quarters of the country were paying their taxes in paper, those banks must either pay in paper as valuable as specie, or in specie itself; the inevitable consequence must be, that the banks of that part of the country must follow the example of all the other banks. All the banks in the country would then be united against a return to specie payment. So far as he had heard, Mr. B. said that the opinion of a large majority of the Senate was, that some course of measures should be adopted for the remedy of the evil; the only question was as to the mode. He had heard but two modes proposed; the one, to declare by law that after a certain day the paper of those banks refusing to pay specie should not be receivable in dues to the Government; the other, to establish a National Bank. The first plan, he said, was impracticable; the people cannot pay what they cannot get—besides, that such a measure would cause a combination of the banks, too strong for the Government to overpower. Mr. B. said he would go further; he believed a large majority of the Senate had declared themselves in favor of a National Bank; that they had made up their minds that it was the best possible means of restoring the country to the old state of things. Now, he asked, whether, on a question of mere detail, they ought to risk the loss of an object so important as this bill? Mr. B. asserted to the Senate, and he said he would justify the ground, that, although this bill might not be perfect, he should vote against every amendment of every character; justified in so doing by the importance of the passage of the bill. The honorable gentleman from New York had strongly inveighed against such a course. Mr. B. intimated that it was precisely the course the gentleman himself had taken on the question of the Direct Tax at a former session. It had been then admitted that amendments proposed would make the bill more perfect; but their rejection was justified on the ground of the importance of the bill, and the probability that an agreement to the amendments might occasion the rejection of the bill on its return to the other House. That was a correct course, Mr. B. said, and that course he should now pursue. He also referred to a precedent of higher authority—the recommendation of the Convention who framed the Constitution, to the people, that, although susceptible of amendment to advantage, the Constitution should be accepted as it stood, lest, by the collision of opinion on amendments, it should be lost. The Constitution had been accordingly so accepted, and subsequently amended by adding to it new sections. Mr. B. was against all amendments to the bill. In regard to this particular feature of the bill, it could not, in any view, be of sufficient importance to justify endangering the bill. He denied the justice of the intimation that this was not to be a specie bank. Substantially, he said, it possessed all the features of the old Bank of the United States, the plan of which gentlemen had so highly approved; with the addition of several important checks not contained in the plan of that bank, the nature of which Mr. B. explained. He vindicated some of the principal features of this bill, to which, on either hand, objections had been made, particularly that which gave the appointment of five of the directors to the Government—which was due to the interest of the Government in the bank, as well on account of its stock, as of the necessary attention to the security of its deposits. As to its not being a specie bank, if the control of the Government was as powerful as he considered it, it would be the fault of the Government alone if it were not a specie bank. We must suppose the Government and the people themselves corrupted, before you suppose that it will not be a specie bank. With the aid of all the Eastern banks, being, besides, the depository of the revenue of the United States, and thus having all the State banks debtors to it, how could the State banks destroy it? Congress might additionally provide that, at some distant day, the notes of banks not paying specie, should cease to be received in payment of dues to the Government, &c.—at some distant day, he said, for he was not for destroying or injuring the State banks, &c. Mr. B. concluded his speech by expressing his hope that the Senate would not agree to any amendment to the bill.

Mr. BARBOUR, of Virginia, next took the floor, and opposed the proposed amendment in a speech of considerable length, of which what follows is but an outline. He, too, like the gentleman from Georgia, considered the question of bank or no bank as the most important that could be presented to the National Legislature at this session. The rejection of this bill, he believed, would expose us to a continuation of all the inconveniences experienced in every quarter of the Union from the present state of the circulating medium, causing a fluctuation and uncertainty in the value of property and products greatly to be deprecated, and bringing with it a train of evils it would be almost impossible to enumerate. On the other hand, he said, he had such confidence in the efficacy of a National Bank, in correcting the evils of the mass of paper afloat, in enabling the Government and individuals to fulfil their engagements, that he had brought his mind to the conclusion that the establishment of a National Bank would be an epoch in the affairs of the nation; that, instead of the cloud which darkens the horizon, it will usher in a new day of prosperity, replete with benefits to the nation, &c. With the gentleman from New York, (Mr. KING,) Mr. B. said, he entirely coincided in sentiment as to the respect due to public opinion, when distinctly expressed and well understood; but why that sentiment was recurring to at the present time, he did not precisely understand; for sure he was, that on this occasion it had been audibly and distinctly expressed from every part of the United States, as well as from the Executive authority, in favor of this measure: and above all, it had been recently declared from an unequivocal source, the House of Representatives, who are the mirror in which the sentiments of the people are reflected, and whose decision on such a topic is a pillar of light, the pursuit of which will never involve us in difficulty. Mr. B. agreed, also, with the gentleman in his views of the independent duty of this House, in reviewing the proceedings of the other branch of the Legislature, so far as regarded the absolute right of the Senate to decide, according to their own impressions of the fitness of things, on measures presented to them by the other House; but if the gentleman meant that it was a reason for jealousy in regard to any measure that it had passed that House, Mr. B. differed from him toto calo. On the contrary, he said, that circumstance would be, with him, a persuasive argument in favor of any measure; for, though he would surrender to them no part of the rights of this body, he should perpetually recur to that body as an oracle from which true responses may be drawn as to the public will. It may err; when it did, in his opinion, he should not feel himself bound by its views, &c.

Mr. B. then proceeded to the consideration of the great subject before the House. The Constitution, he said, had imparted to the Congress, among other great attributes, the power of regulating the coin of the United States. How had Congress acquitted themselves of this duty? Where and of what effect were these regulations? Where was the uniformity of currency? Mr. B. described the variety and fluctuation of value of the paper in circulation, not only in various States, but in contiguous towns and counties, &c. This was a great evil, deprecated on all hands. The power intended by the Constitution to have been lodged in the hands of the General Government, was, by the failure of the Government to make use of it, exercised by every State in the Union, frequently by individuals, &c. Hence arose an excess of paper issues, causing depreciation to an extent which could scarcely be estimated—an evil which called for a remedy in a language not to be misunderstood. Where was the antidote which the Executive, in this only the organ of the public sentiment, had called on Congress to interpose? The patient, said Mr. B., is sick, from the crown of his head to the sole of his foot; he asks for oil and wine to be poured into his wounds, which would be otherwise fatal. Where is the man who will propose any other antidote than that now before us? Where is the adventurous knight who will suggest another remedy? If there be a Don Quixote in politics, let him appear. No, Mr. B. said, not even a nostrum had been tendered to substitute this plan. If no other remedy was offered, ought they, he asked, to higgie about details, to split hairs on the question? Mr. B. then spoke of the necessity of mutual concession among legislators; without which, he said, the idea of legislation was the most vague and illusory that ever entered the human mind. It was necessary, Mr. B. then argued, for the present diseased paper medium, since specie had fled the country, or was scattered in the bowels of the earth, to substitute a medium impressed with the seal of the nation. If an institution were established to issue a paper of that description, we should have, he said, in lieu of a medium, the value of which will not live ten, fifteen, or twenty miles from the spot where we receive it, a paper which will embrace the Union in its grasp. It would also be a great financial instrument, necessary to the fulfilment of the national duties in this respect. On this head, the experience of the last wars spoke a language which incredulity itself could not doubt. In the dark and gloomy period of the last Winter, when this subject was discussed, no doubt had been entertained that this was the only means of remedying an evil from which so much was apprehended. That time, he rejoiced, had passed by; but he hoped the lessons of experience would not be permitted to pass away with the urgency of the occasion.

In regard to the details of this bill, he said, he did not see the necessity of amending them. It had been stated that this would be a paper bank, and in order to prevent that, an increase of the specie payments was suggested. Mr. B. believed such an amendment was unnecessary. Being not necessary, what, he asked, would be its effect? It would be to place the bank wholly in the hands of a few fortunate individuals or banks who had specie in their possession. The smaller the first payment in specie was made, within the limits of necessity to the object, in his opinion, the wiser would be the plan. The establishment of a bank, or any other system, could not be expected to afford an instant remedy to the existing evil, any more than a dose of medicine would restore to instant health and pristine vigor the man who had been wasting by long sickness. The effect of this amendment, without accelerating the operations of the bank, would be to favor the monopolist of specie, &c., he who had had the caution or forecast to board up the dollars and cents. The bulk of the specie to be paid into this bank, Mr. B. had no doubt, ought and must be drawn from abroad. In regard to the argument, that the sum was too small to enable the bank to commence its operations with safety, &c., Mr. B. contended that money was too sharp-sighted, too lynx-eyed in its vigilance to be (using a common saying) caught napping. There was no fear, he said, of the banks being ruined, by lending money to men pressed from other quarters; the board of direction of a bank formed a barometer in which the responsibility of every man passing before it was as correctly graduated as the weather is by the instrument so called; they would take care, as they always did, not to part with their dollars to accommodate an unfortunate debtor, &c. In answer to the argument of Mr. KING, who, he said, had discovered that this was to be a paper and not a specie bank, and was to aggravate the evils it was intended to cure, Mr. B. referred to the regulations by which it was to be governed to show that this apprehension was unfounded. Besides, he said, the bank would not disregard its interest, which required it to continue specie payments. You need not fence in the interests of this institution, said he; you might as well pass a law to compel your Secretary to receive his salary; interest is the strongest security which man can give to man. As the needle acknowledges the principle of polarity, so does the human heart always point to its interest. That objection against this bill, therefore, seemed to Mr. B. to be a chimera from which nothing was to be apprehended.

It was no question now, he said, whether banking should exist—that being beyond the control of Congress; but whether it was proper that a portion of it should be placed under the authority of the General Government, instead of its being wholly under the control of the States, who establish banks not only in their populous towns, but even in the dreary wilderness. This being the only question, he solemnly appealed to gentlemen, whether there could be two opinions on that point. Ought this great attribute of sovereignty to be surrendered by this Government to the authority of the State Legislatures? This question he answered in the negative. The existing evil, he then argued, would be remedied by the establishment of a bank, whose influence was ramified into every part of the United States. The State banks had nothing to fear, if they would conduct themselves properly, from such an institution. If any of them, on the other hand, should violate their trust, and show a centrifugal quality, it would be in the power of this great orb to restore them to their stations. If any of the State banks do not fulfil their engagements, Mr. B. said, if they do not meet the occasion, their paper will sink into disrepute. This bank will be the silent and efficient remedy; it will move on almost imperceptibly, gradual in its approach, but certain in its effects. Mr. B. took this occasion to vindicate the banks in the Commonwealth of Virginia from the charge it had been fashionable to make against the State banks, of improvidence in their administration. Those banks resisted to the utmost the attempts to procure loans from them; that which they had, with great reluctance, from a sense of duty refused to the Government, their patriotism at length induced them to grant to the wants of thousands of men surrounding their capital, who but for their relief would have greatly suffered, &c. Where banks had wantonly abused their privileges, he cared not what was said of them, but he felt no disposition to put those under the ban of the empire who had acted thus correctly, &c.

In regard to objections he had heard to the influence of the Government over this bank, Mr. B. said, his objection was, that it had not interest enough in it; but in this respect, as in others, he was willing, to obtain a great object, to concede some part of his views. He recurred to the experience of his own State to show that no evils had been experienced from the existence of such a control to a much greater extent than proposed in this bill, &c. No banks, he believed, had been better conducted, or stood higher in the public opinion, than those of Virginia. If the bank were a faithful one, it had no fear to apprehend from the appointment by the Government of one-fifth of its directors, to which proportion the Government was entitled by the interest it would have with the bank.

Having thus briefly touched on all the objections he had heard to the bank, Mr. B. concluded by recapitulating his arguments, and expressing his hope that the only remedy as he believed, for a great evil, would be agreed to.

Mr. MASON, of New Hampshire, spoke in support of his motion to amend the bill. He certainly had entertained no expectation, he said, when he submitted the motion, that it would have drawn the bill into so general discussion. Whenever a National Bank had been proposed, he said, he had always supported it with such modifications as he thought correct. He did believe a well regulated institution of this kind would be useful to the Government; and, though the Government had at a certain period declined the exercise of its power in this respect, he felt no inclination to prevent them from again occupying the ground of the old United States Bank. He was, he said, now willing to give his aid in establishing a bank on proper principles; but he never could assent to this or any other measure on the ground taken by the gentlemen from Georgia and Virginia. The bill was, according to the forms of the Senate, read section by section for the purpose of amendment; and yet gentlemen declared they would not listen to any proposition to amend the bill, but take it as it stood. [Mr. BIBB explained, that his remark was confined to unessential amendments.] It might, Mr. M. said, be difficult to define what makes an amendment important; for him it was sufficient reason for an amendment, that the bill would be better with than without it. He could not, he said, see the force of the objection to sending this bill back to the House of Representatives better than it came from them; gentlemen must certainly conclude that that House was greatly in love with a bad bill. It always had been held irregular to suggest in one branch of the Legislature what might have passed in debate in the co-ordinate branch; it was certainly, Mr. M. said, more improper to go into a wide field of conjecture to find out what would happen there. Although there might be good reasons for concession and accommodation to the views of the other House, Mr. M. said, they had not yet arrived at that stage of the business when it was necessary, which was not until the House should refuse to accept the amendments of the Senate. It was a dangerous ground to assume, Mr. M. added, that the House of Representatives would vary their ground on this question. Although he had as much respect for them as he ought, he also remarked, he should not take public opinion from the Representatives of the people. The Constitution prescribed to the Senate no such practice. The course of taking measures from the popular branch of the Legislature, believing them proper because it has adopted them, precludes all legislation, &c., and is therefore inconsistent with the principles of our Government.

Mr. M. agreed that the public suffered much inconvenience from what was termed the state of the public medium; it was not very material whether it was produced by what the gentleman from Georgia had termed swindling, or what the gentleman from Virginia had called the patriotic conduct of the banks. Mr. M. replied to other arguments used by the gentlemen who had opposed his motion. In regard to the operation of interest on moneyed institutions, he said, he believed that principle was felt as much by the State banks as by that which it was now proposed to incorporate. Any bank, guided by other motives, would depart from the objects of the institution. Mr. M. attached no sort of consequence to the idea of the passage of this bill, in order to exercise the power of the Government to regulate the coin of the country. The laws of the United States, he said, had already regulated it, he knew of no law which authorized any officer of the Government to receive any part of this spurious money which the gentleman said was in circulation. The laws were already perfect on this subject. If the Executive officers had received other moneys in payment than those authorized by law, Mr. M. said, they had acted without law—without right. What necessity there might have been for their doing so, he would not now examine. Cases might arise, in which the officers of the Government may take upon themselves the responsibility of neglecting the execution of a law, &c. That an evil existed, he said, all agree, and all suppose that the bank to be incorporated by this bill will in a greater or less degree lessen the evil, or entirely correct it. The object of his motion was to give the bank the greatest possible power to effect these purposes. It had been said, that the bank would at first move slowly. But, Mr. M. said, he had no sanguine anticipation that this amendment, or any other, or the prudence of the directors, would be able wholly to cure the evil. What had been the cause of the evil? The banks themselves; banks incorporated under the same restrictions as this bill contained, issue now the very rags which had been described. The remedy now proposed, was, Mr. M. thought, something like Sangrado's practice: more bank paper of the same sort—more hot water for the same evil. In regard to the impossibility of this bank's doing anything but a specie business, Mr. M. undertook to assert, that the charter, in its present shape, gave the bank the power to issue notes, without even promising payment of specie. The clause which authorizes the bank to issue notes did, in fact, for the want of due restrictions, authorize the bank to issue notes payable when it pleased; none but notes payable on demand were indeed receivable in payment of taxes to the Government—but they might be issued payable two years after date for other purposes, and would probably circulate quite as well as the notes of New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore. He should imagine, he said, that, as the bank was now constituted, sensible men, having the management of it, would not attempt to do business without taking that course. Mr. M. pointed out other defects, as he viewed them, of the bill.

There was no provision for a forfeiture of the charter of the bank, or for annulment on failure of its going promptly into operation. However, it would be idle, he said, to discuss the bill, if the opinions of the gentlemen from Georgia and Virginia were to prevail with the majority of the Senate, that it would be dangerous to amend the bill, lest it should fail thereby. If this was the opinion of the Senate, the sooner they came to that determination the better; it would save them labor, and perhaps character, to decide the question at once. The same argument might be urged, he said, with as much propriety every day, and on every subject, as had been principally urged against the amendment.

Mr. DANA, of Connecticut, said he did not expect to vote for the bank bill in its present form, but notwithstanding, he did not think it would be proper to adopt this amendment; one-twentieth part of the whole capital, appeared to him to be as large a proportion as ought to be called for in specie at the time of subscription. If danger were anticipated from the smallness of the amount of specie, it would perhaps be better to introduce into the bill a provision, that the bank should not issue paper until it had a sufficient quantity of coin to justify it in so doing. Though he should not vote for the bank, he should regret to see its first issues to individuals who were connected with the institution; indeed, he should rather suppose, the great demand for discounts from the bank, would be to enable the merchants to pay bonds, constantly falling due to the Government for customs. These merchants, for their notes, will obtain credits at the bank, to the amount of perhaps, seven, eight, or ten millions in the course of the year. The United States will be the only power that can call for it; and, Mr. D. presumed, there would be no danger of a run on the bank from the Government, &c.

SENATE.

Bank of the United States.

Mr. TAYLOR, of South Carolina, said he should have liked to have heard the amendment argued on its own merits, because the force of the argument against would perhaps be weakened by connecting it with other considerations which had been brought into debate. If he approved of the amendment, he would vote for it, though he would say, that for a small or inconsiderable alteration, he would not jeopardize a great principle or a great measure, such as he conceived this bill. With respect to the proposed amendment, considering the state of the currency of the country, and the known fact that specie abounds in parts of the country, whilst in others it is not to be obtained at all—to carry the gentleman's amendment more directly to what would be its absolute result, he ought first to have provided for confining the opening of the books of subscription to that part of the country where specie is in a state of circulation. Without designing it, for he would not certainly impute such a design to the gentleman, the adoption of this amendment would be giving a complete monopoly to the Eastern country. Believing it desirable that the benefits of this institution should be extended to every part of the country, he was therefore opposed to the amendment. The restoration of specie payments, Mr. T. said, was not the work of a moment. The power to sell two millions of its stock in the first year, of which the bank would no doubt avail itself, and the deposits of the Government, together with the specie paid in on the subscription, would, he said, enable the bank to operate to as great an extent as was advisable. This amendment, besides being unnecessary, would, he believed, produce an undue monopoly to one section of the country, and to the boarders where specie was not current. It is calculated to reward those whose conduct has had a tendency to bring about the very evil now proposed to be remedied. The amendment would also throw advantages into the hands of the capitalists of Charleston, &c., which it would deny to those of the middle country; for it so happened, in the course of trade, that specie was reduced in value there to about two and a half to five per cent. above the current paper of that State, not more than in ordinary times used to be given for specie in quantities. For these general reasons, Mr. T. was opposed to the amendments.

Mr. MASON, of New Hampshire, remarked that specie was not confined to the Eastern or Southern States; the banks in the Middle States still retain as much specie as they ever had. If the bank might sell stock for specie, why might not individuals do the same, in the first instance, and pay it into the bank? United States' stock would at a certain price command specie anywhere.

Mr. SANFORD spoke in support of the proposed amendment, denying the correctness of the doctrine on which opposition was made to any amendment of this bill. It was a subject, he said, which particularly required caution and circumspection in deciding upon it. He considered the amendment before the Senate as presenting this question: With what sum shall the bank commence its operations? This being intended to be a specie bank, Mr. S. said, every proposition tending more certainly to make it more so, was worthy of favorable consideration. The bill as it stood contemplated $1,400,000 in specie as a sufficient basis for the bank to begin upon. Mr. S. said, he could not but think, with Mr. Mason, that this sum was too small. There was nothing in the bill to prevent the bank from issuing $35,000,000 on this amount of specie paid in, if they thought proper to do so. Those who were called on to pay the second instalment in specie would, he said, go to the bank with its bills, and drain it at once of every dollar. The bill was, Mr. S. thought, in other respects, deficient in detail, as he showed by reference to its provisions. The bank would get no specie but what it received in the first payment, unless the course of exchange should become more favorable, or the state of things generally should essentially vary. The rational and prudent course, he thought, would be, to require as much specie as possible in the first instance. Without amendments to regulate the paper issues of the bank, &c., this would be a mere paper bank, he said, like those which already exist. The amendment appeared to him extremely proper, and therefore he should vote for it.

Mr. TAYLOR replied to Mr. SANFORD, and quoted the provisions of the bank to show, that the bank dare not issue one dollar more paper than it had a reasonable prospect of being able to honor with gold or silver. The bank had the power to do otherwise, it was true; and so have we power to cut our own throats—but the bank is no more likely than we are to commit a felo de se. As to the second instalment being paid with the specie of the first, Mr. T. said, it was impossible to pay $2,800,000, (the amount of the second instalment,) with $1,400,000, (the amount of the first,) and the worst, therefore, only one-half of the second instalment could be drawn from the vaults of the bank.

TUESDAY, March 26.

Mr. DANA presented the petition of Nehemiah Hubbard, and others, inhabitants of the collection district of Middletown, in the State of Connecticut, praying that the port of Middletown may be constituted a port of entry, for reasons stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to a select committee; and Messrs. DANA, SANFORD, and DAGGETT, were appointed the committee.

Mr. WILSON, from the committee to whom was recommitteed the bill entitled "An act in addition to 'An act to regulate the Post Office Establishment,'" reported it with amendments, which were read and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and the amendments having been agreed to, with a further amendment, the President reported the bill to the House accordingly; and on the question, "Shall the amendments be engrossed, and the bill read a third time as amended?" it was determined in the affirmative.

Mr. BARBOUR, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of John T. Wirt," reported it without amendment.

The bill establishing a port of delivery at the Bayou St. John, was read the second time.

The bill, entitled "An act placing certain persons on the list of navy pensioners," was read the second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, to consider and report thereon.

The bill, entitled "An act for organizing the general staff, and making further provision for the Army of the United States," was read the second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made the 22d instant, for information in relation to the proceedings which have been had in pursuance of the act of the 10th of February, 1807, entitled "An act to provide for surveying the coasts of the United States," and agreed thereto.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on Finance and an Uniform National Currency, to whom was referred the petition of Willet Coles. Whereupon, the petitioner had leave to withdraw his petition.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States."

Mr. MASON, of New Hampshire, having withdrawn the motion made the 25th instant, to amend the third section, proposed the following proviso to be added to the 12th rule:

"Provided, That all bills or notes so to be issued by said corporation, shall be made payable on demand, other than bills or notes for the payment of a sum not less than ——— dollars each, and payable to the order of some person or persons, which bills or notes it shall be lawful for said corporation to make payable at any time not exceeding ——— days from the date thereof."

This motion gave rise to considerable debate between those who thought such a restriction necessary and those of a different opinion. It was at length agreed to by yeas and nays.

On the question to agree thereto, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 20, nays 14, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Daggett, Dana, Fromentin, Gaillard, Goldsborough, Gore, Horsey, Hunter, King, Macon, Mason of New Hampshire, Mason of Virginia, Sanford, Taylor, Thompson, Tichenor, Wells, Williams, and Wilson.

NAYS—Messrs. Barbour, Barry, Bibb, Campbell, Chace, Condit, Howell, Lacock, Morrow, Roberts, Ruggles, Tait, Turner, and Varnum.

This decision in favor of one amendment opened the door to the proposition of a great number of amendments which have been or will be proposed to the bill.

The discussion of one or two that were proposed occupied the Senate until the hour of adjournment.

WEDNESDAY, March 27.

Mr. DAGGETT presented the petition of Daniel Carroll, of Duddington, and others, citizens of Washington, praying an act to incorporate a company to continue a turnpike road leading from Calvert's mills, from the District line, to the Eastern Branch bridge, as stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to a select committee; and Messrs. DAGGETT, HORSEY, and MASON of Virginia, were appointed the committee.

Mr. TAIT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act placing certain persons on the list of navy pensioners," reported it without amendment; and the bill having been considered as in Committee of the Whole, it passed to a third reading.

Mr. TAIT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill to reward the officers and crew of the United States frigate Constitution; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act authorizing and requiring the Secretary of State to issue letters patent to Andrew Kurtz;" and it passed to a third reading.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to authorize the Legislature of the State of Ohio to sell a certain part of a tract of land reserved for the use of that State; and on the question, "Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time?" it was determined in the affirmative.

Mr. LACOCK submitted the following motion for consideration:

Mr. DAGGETT, from the joint committee appointed to examine the business on the tables of the two Houses, to ascertain what portion required to be acted on this session, and to fix on a period for its close, made a report, together with the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives be authorized to close this session, by the adjournment of their respective Houses, on the 22d day of April, 1816.

The report and resolution were read, and passed to the second reading.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The Senate resumed the Bank bill. The consideration of amendments progressed. An amendment was adopted, among others, to postpone the opening of the books from the 1st day of June to the 1st day of July.

Mr. MASON, of New Hampshire, then moved another amendment, by way of a new section, to declare the act null and void, if the bank is not put into operation within one year after its date.

Mr. BIBB moved to amend this amendment so as to make it reserve to Congress the right to annul the charter, at any time within twelve months after the 1st day of February next, if the bank be not put in operation before that day.

These motions gave rise to much desultory debate, as indeed did all the amendments proposed.

Mr. BIBB's motion was agreed to; and Mr. MASON's proposition, so modified, was agreed to.

Mr. CAMPBELL then moved to amend that part of the bill which directs books to be opened at certain places, so as to assign to each State a certain proportion of the stock to be subscribed, to remain there for a certain time; to allow it to be subscribed in the States respectively, in proportion to their representation—intending to follow up this amendment by a motion to introduce a provision that the bank should be compelled, on the request of the Legislature of any State, to establish a branch of the bank therein.

In support of this motion, Mr. C. made a speech of some length on the general principles of the bill.

This amendment was in the end negatived by a vote of 20 to 11.

THURSDAY, March 28.

The bill to reward the officers and crew of the United States frigate Constitution, was read the second time.

Mr. KING, from the committee to whom was recommitment the bill for the benefit of the widow and children of Robert Fulton, deceased, reported it with an amendment, which was read.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to authorize the President of the United States to alter the road laid out from the foot of the rapids of the river Miami of Lake Erie, to the western line of the Connecticut Reserve; and no amendment having been proposed thereto, on the question, "Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time?" it was determined in the affirmative.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill establishing a port of delivery at the town of Bayou St. John; and the bill having been amended, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House accordingly; and on the question, "Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time?" it was determined in the affirmative.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill entitled "An act for the relief of John T. Wirt," and it passed to a third reading.

The bill entitled "An act in addition to an act to regulate the Post Office Establishment," was read a third time as amended, and was further amended by unanimous consent, and passed with amendments.

MR. WELLS rose and addressed the Chair, as follows:

MR. President, the Senate having gone through the different amendments which have been before them, and it not being probable that there are many more, if any other, intended to be brought forward, the proper period for submitting a proposition, which will fairly bring into notice the general views of this subject, has, perhaps, now arrived. In support, then, of the proposition of postponement, to the first Monday in December next, of the further consideration of this bill, which I purpose to move you, I beg the indulgence of the Senate, while I endeavor to show, first, that it transcends the Constitutional power of Congress to pass a bill containing the provisions which this does; secondly, the inexpediency of enacting such a law as this, even if we possess the Constitutional power to do it; and thirdly, that our true policy is to avoid, at this time, legislating upon the subject—to pass no law, at the present session, incorporating a banking company.

That which has heretofore been the occasion of so much heated controversy, was simply a question relating to the existence or non-existence of a power in Congress to incorporate a company for establishing a bank. That question is now at rest, nor do I propose to disturb it. The sole inquiry we now have to make is, as to the true character and just extent of this authority, that we may not, in the exercise of it, carry it beyond its proper limits.

The power that is granted is a power to establish a bank for a particular end, and, of course, constitutes only a part of the general power, in relation to the establishment of banks that previously existed in the States. For this reason it is a power of a minor character to that of the States, and is to be exercised always with a steady and distinct view to the end for which it is created. So far as it goes, it is a lawful power, and has a right to pursue its prescribed course. It may keep company with the State authority, but has no right to quarrel and slay its companion on the road. Every application, then, of this power, by the United States, which has a tendency to embarrass or impair the free exercise of the power reserved to the States, is unwarranted, and if done by us with a view to such a purpose, is the affair of arrogance and usurpation.

This is not a primary, expressed, original power. In vain, as such, do we seek for it in the Constitution. It is only a secondary, an implied, derivative power, if such may be properly termed the means of executing an expressly delegated power. Here it may fairly be asked, Why was this power left to implication? Did it escape notice? Was it overlooked? Was it too unimportant for enumeration? Every view of this subject, and every relation in which it can be placed, to the other authorities, affords an inference not easily resisted, that a grant of this power was not intended to be applied. If the express grant of such a power was moved, the silence of the Constitution, as to that power, proves that it must have been rejected. I understand that it was moved in that body, and was rejected. If this was actually the case, (as I am persuaded it was,) it certainly requires the utmost effort of ingenuity to prove that this power was left to implication, in order that the subordination of its character might be the more clearly established, and the arrogance of its pretensions the more easily repressed. This is all, if it be not a great deal more than any fair mode of interpreting the Constitution, as we have it, will warrant. We cannot, for a moment, suppose that the great men, who formed this frame of government, were unacquainted with, or unmindful of, the imposing character of this power, or of its history here or abroad. Did they not know that a proposition to incorporate a banking company, by the old Congress, had been, by that body, rejected? And furthermore, could those grave and learned men been unaware (if they intended this power to be inferred as a means of executing another power) of the arduous, perhaps I might be permitted to say, the odious character of the task they devolved upon implication? Did not that enlightened body know that grants of specially enumerated authorities would not warrant the exercise of a power as a means for carrying into effect another power, where the means itself is, in character and importance, entitled to rank with some one of the enumerated authorities? That such is the real character of the means in question, in relation to some of those authorities, even limited and circumscribed as it may be, I am obliged to admit there is too much reason for insisting. That I have a doubt, therefore, on my mind, on this point, I am free to confess. It is possible, perhaps it is probable, if the vote I am to give upon this bill demanded of me, in respect to that difficulty, a decision, that further deliberation, aided by the authorities which, I am told, support the opposite opinion, might remove that doubt.

Sir, I confidently rely upon the cheerfulness with which honorable gentlemen who have heretofore so strenuously denied the existence of the power in question in this Government, will accompany me in the inquiry respecting the extent of this power. It is agreed, on all hands, to be (not an original, substantive, but) a derivative, incidental power. What, then, is the specially enumerated power to which it is incident, as one of the "necessary and proper" means for its execution?

Is it an incident to the power to "promote the general welfare?" The capacious character of this provision, if it is to be viewed simply as a grant of power, would render the subsequent enumeration of special powers a matter of supererogation. The terms "general welfare," when used in the Constitution, can only be considered as having themselves reference to one of the great objects for the promotion of which this Government was established, and for the accomplishment of which the special powers, contained in the Constitution, have been delegated.

Is this authority to establish a bank an incident to the power of Congress "to borrow money on the credit of the United States," by reason of its correlative tendency in procuring a faculty to lend? If this be the source from which it is lawfully derived, we need look no further for the origin of this or of any other authority. If this be its fountain-head, we have here a never-failing spring of power, abundantly sufficient for all the purposes, lawful or unlawful, of this or of any other Government upon earth. I turn away from it, therefore, without further investigation.

Is this power derived from that of coining money, regulating its value and that of foreign coin? Is the right to establish a National Bank, on account of its tendency in our hands to operate upon what is called the currency of the country, derived from this or any other specially delegated authority? There are two provisions in the Constitution which have some bearing upon this point. That to which I have just referred respecting coin, and that which prohibits the States the issue of "bills of credit, and the declaring of anything but gold and silver a lawful tender in the payment of debts." It cannot be necessary to argue that a power to make a bank distinctly with a view to its putting into circulation promissory notes that shall have the faculty of mixing and keeping company with the currency of the country, and of becoming something like paper money, is not a necessary and proper auxiliary to the power in this Government of making a metallic medium; that a power, in short, to make a metallic money has not incident to it, as a "necessary and proper" means for its execution, the power to make a paper money. Nor need any time be spent in resisting an inference, drawn from a restraint imposed upon a particular power in the State governments, which affects to communicate to, and to set up in, this Government a faculty co-ordinate with another power, which is left in those governments, free and unshackled. So far, then, as honorable gentlemen say this measure is intended or calculated, whether with a view to regulation or improvement, or under any other pretence, to operate upon what is called the national currency; or, in other words, to restrain the States from establishing similar institutions, and impair the free exercise of the franchises of those already incorporated, it is warranted by no part of the Constitution.

I come now, sir, to that part of the Constitution where alone can be found, if anywhere, the lawful source of the authority of this Government to incorporate a banking company. We have the power "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises," for certain great national purposes. It is now admitted, by most of the former opponents of this doctrine, that the establishment of a National Bank is nothing more than the employment of a "necessary and proper" means for carrying "into execution" the power to which I have just referred. The correctness of this doctrine, I have before declared it to be not my purpose to call into question. This part of my argument is entirely predicated upon its admission, and is designed solely to be confined to those views of the subject which will show the true character and just extent of this authority, and enable us to determine whether we are not carrying it, by the provisions of the bill now on our tables, further than is warranted by the Constitution. This, then, being the power to which the authority to establish a bank is incident, as a "necessary and proper" means for its execution, we cannot have much difficulty in the definition of its limits. Its effect upon this power must be in relation to the collection, the safe-keeping and transmission of the public revenue. The notes which a bank issues may (but, by the by, the affairs of a bank may be mismanaged and they may not) provide the people with an equal medium for the payment of their public dues to this Government. This is, to a certain extent, to operate upon the currency; it is not merely to afford the people, in their relations with the Government, something more portable and convenient to procure, and pay, than metallic money, but it is to provide them with a medium of contribution, at a time when the metallic medium shall disappear from circulation. Here provision, in relation to the currency generally, would seem at first, to be intended for an event like that of the disappearance of the metallic medium; but we must always remember that our power, in relation to the medium of circulation, refers solely to a metallic medium; and of course excludes the other—expressio unius est exclusio alterius. If it be not questioned how far, in this point of view, as connected with the currency (a subject, as before-mentioned, expressly legislated upon) there is a power to procure for the people these kind of facilities, for the payment of their taxes; surely the power must, in this respect, confine itself directly to this end. What then is the capital necessary for constituting a bank to answer this purpose? This ought to have been shown us. Those who have no warrant to employ this power, but distinctly with a view to the attainment of a particular end, must have known that the purposes for which alone it can be lawfully used, prescribe the limitations to its exercise. The moral obligation imposed upon them not to exceed those limits, requires, likewise, that they should ascertain where they were placed. If there has been an inquiry made upon this head, what principles have guided that inquiry; and which of them have been presented to the Senate? What calculations have been submitted to us, to show that, in respect to the capital, we are not exceeding the pale of our authority? The hazard of excess must not be incurred, while there are any means at our command of ascertaining how it may be avoided. It is not for those of us who think it, at this time, inexpedient to establish a bank, to show where the excess is. It is incumbent upon the friends of this bill, who call upon us for our votes, who desire that we should keep them company, to prove to us that they are going no further than they ought to go. This they have not done. It has not been affirmatively proven to us that a capital to this amount is necessary; and, for one, I think it can be demonstrated that a capital of thirty-five millions, is larger than is required, for the purposes for which we are to establish a bank. A capital much lower than even twenty millions would be adequate to the establishment of a bank, in each State in the Union; and the objects of safe-keeping, and easy transmission of the public revenue accomplished. The capital of this bank, with a view to the effect of its notes, in affording an equal medium for the payment by the people, and the receipt by the Government, of the public dues, is not to be inquired into, with a view to any given state of things. The charter is to last for twenty years. If this capital, during that period, should be likely to become too small, the power to raise it by our own, or other subscriptions, may be reserved. If we have a view, in ascertaining the proper extent of this capital, to periods when the preservative of a metallic medium shall be withdrawn from the paper circulation, then this capital (if the bank is to be what its advocates insist upon to be their intention to render it, a specie paying bank,) is unnecessarily large. Its issues, in such times, must be limited, not by the amount of the public revenue, but by that of the specie in its vaults. If our attention, however, is principally directed, as to me it seems it ought to be, to the usual and natural state of things, when the presence of the metallic medium will afford to the paper currency a free and uninterrupted circulation, then a much smaller capital than that of thirty-five millions, in such a state of things, would enable the bank, by the successive issues and returns of its paper, to afford to the people and to the Government the desired facilities. The process between the Government and the people, is that of payment and disbursement; and the steady and uniform succession of these operations, which can never be disturbed, communicates to a paper medium, even in a higher degree, the well known faculty belonging to a metallic medium, of transacting a large amount of business, with a small amount of money. In this view of the subject, can there be a question, whether a much smaller capital would not afford every lawful facility that the revenue operations of this Government require? A capital of ten millions successfully accomplished this object, and with the aid of three or four millions of other banking capital, conjointly with the metallic medium, circulated the whole business of the Government and the country. Surely, then, a national banking capital of twenty millions, with the banking capital of the States, will be now amply sufficient for the same purposes; however high may be our estimate of the increased activity and expansion of the industry and enterprise of the country. If I am well founded in these remarks, I have sustained and established one Constitutional objection to this bill; by showing that the capital of this bank is larger than is necessary for the accomplishment of the objects we are required to keep in view, in the establishment of this institution.

There is another and a more interesting point of view which it remains to notice, and which goes to show that this bill does not merely, in respect to capital, exceed our Constitutional authority. I refer to that provision which authorizes the appointment of a certain proportion of the directors of this bank by the Government. Every control and authority over this great moneyed institution, so intimately connected as it is with the great interests of society, beyond what is requisite for the promotion of the limited objects we are bound to keep in view, communicates to the Government an influence and patronage which it has no right to possess. It is proper that I should circumscribe, within narrow limits, what I have to say in respect to the just character of that influence, after the able view of it which must have been presented by the honorable member from New York (Mr. KING) in support of his motion to strike out this part of the bill. The honorable chairman (Mr. BIBB) who reported this bill, in reply to that argument, insisted that there was incident to the power to establish a bank, that of prescribing the regulations which are necessary to guard the country against the mischief it might otherwise do. Sir, I deny not the truth of this position; but still it equally remains to be shown that the regulation in question, which invests the Government with an influence of such magnitude, is "necessary and proper" to prevent a greater mischief than the one which the regulation itself introduces. The honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BARBOUR) contends for the salutary effect of this regulation, and insists that it communicates to the Government an influence too unimportant to justify any serious apprehension. He considers these directors merely as sentinels on the watch tower, and that the smallness of their number can never give to the Government a dangerous ascendancy in the management of this institution. Let us for a moment inquire into the character of these directors. If they are sentinels on the watch tower; if they are to be enlisted into our service, what bounty are we to give them; what pay are they to receive from us? They are to perform for us an important service; they are to apprise us of the earliest approaches of danger. The board of directors will be daily assembled, and these our sentinels must mount guard as often; they are to have a full share of trouble in the superintendence of this institution, and they are to do all this, not for the good of the concern, in which they have no participation, but for our advantage solely, that we may know, in time to take care of ourselves, when this company is likely to go astray from its duty to the stockholders, the country, or the Government. These are services, I admit, of great value, and to be performed, no doubt, by able and virtuous men; and yet, for all this, you pay nothing; and why so? Are we to calculate upon a degree of patriotism and disinterestedness, to which we make no claim ourselves? The truth is, we do not expect these services to be performed for us without remuneration; but the anomaly consists in our not paying for them ourselves. These spies are to be in our service, and to labor for us, on account of the pay they receive from others. In imitation of the Napoleon model, these gentlemen are to be maintained by those whom they are set over to guard. Their posts will be places in request at all times—in peace as well as in war. In times of peace, of public repose, when the business of the country is undisturbed, and the Government in no need of loans from the bank, these directorships will be entirely useless, for any lawful purpose, to the United States. During this period, the men who hold these appointments, and their numerous friends, will be but as vultures fattening on the institution. During this period you obtain a patronage for the Administration, through the medium of these directors, and their retainers, without the performance of any lawful service. In this respect, then, the provision is unconstitutional; and the influence for which you oblige others to pay, is as unjust as it is unconstitutional. But when the season of difficulty arrives; when war shall disturb and break up the regular course of business; when public and private credit shall be shaken; when the good of the country shall imperiously require the affairs of this institution to be conducted with even more than the usual prudence and circumspection, then will be the time that the pernicious agency of this directorship, co-operating with other active influences, will wield this great moneyed corporation, at the will and pleasure of the Government. It is no answer to tell us of the smallness of the number of these directors. The Hercules is in the system—in the power that the Government possesses of continuing or withholding its deposits. These directors are but the club with which you arm him. The smallness of their number is no security. The principle upon which they are introduced is unsound, is corrupt, is contagious, and its natural tendency will be to spread itself. These five directors, (whom the Government then will take care to keep in their own pay,) themselves the absolute creatures of those from whom they have derived their authority, will be sure to find at the board, when the spirit of party in the country runs high, others become as subservient as themselves; and cannot fail, in a season of difficulty and embarrassment, with their united influence, to accomplish, through the fears and the hopes of the rest, whatever shall be demanded of the bank, as the price of the continuance of the Governmental favor. By this process, will loan upon loan be rivetted upon the bank, until this great debtor will become its lord and master. Surely these apprehensions cannot justly be called the offspring of distempered imaginations. Honorable gentlemen certainly who, themselves, have painted in such glowing tints the terrors of this influence—not of the influence of such a body politic as this, in which it is organized, and directly set up and established, and openly avowed to the world, but of one where it was sedulously guarded against—surely such will not insist that there is no foundation for alarm. Formerly it was said, give this new power, this lever, but a fulcrum, a point to rest upon, and, like another Archimedes, it will move the political world as it pleases. Afford it but an opportunity to act upon the States, and there will be nothing in their sovereignties or the people beyond its purchase. Formerly it was calculated, in its mildest form, to destroy the responsibility between the Government and the people; and leading to extravagance, to corruption, and to wicked and ruinous wars, to overturn the liberties of this nation. If these representations of danger were somewhat surcharged in respect to the former institution, how just are they with respect to the present! To me it seems that now is the time that we ought most sedulously to guard against a power of this kind in the Government, while the young, the enterprising, the ambitious, and the military character of this country is developing itself. I say the military character of this nation, because it is but too apparent that the events of the late “glorious war” (as it is not unfrequently triumphantly termed) have had no tendency to increase our fondness for the pursuits of peace. That there was glory in that war I am proud to acknowledge; but speaking of the war generally, and the situation of the country during its continuance, of its causes, and its errors, I may be permitted to say, if there was glory—and I repeat again I am proud to acknowledge it—it was only “gloom in glory dressed.” Much, sir, I fear that this happy country, once so fond of peace, when sufficiently practised upon, is to become as deeply enamored of war and valorous enterprise as La Mancha’s Knight, and, with him, is to be made to exclaim, “armor is our dress and battles our repose.” I shall press this objection no farther. We are permitted by the Constitution to incorporate a banking company to facilitate the collection and disbursement of our revenue. It has been shown that this power must be exercised with a view to its proper objects, and that every regulation that looks further than the attainment of these objects is unwarranted; and in relation to this directorship, I think it must be apparent, that it is entirely foreign to these objects; or, if in a slight degree incidentally connected with them, that its main bearing is upon other points, and that its general tendency, by the concurring testimony of all parties, is to communicate an influence to the Government of the United States of an extremely dangerous character. The bill, therefore, in this respect, is unconstitutional.

The remaining Constitutional objection to this bill arises from its interference with the concurrent power of the States. It is to operate upon the State banks, “peaceably if it can, forcibly if it must.” With this object in view, the bill no doubt has been formed to have due effect. Indeed, with the controlling influence of the Government, it cannot fail to accomplish its object, whenever the necessary impulse for that purpose shall be given. If a faculty is communicated to a power in this Government to regulate a concurrent power in the State governments, there is an end at once of the co-ordinacy of these powers; one of them instantly becomes only the humble dependant upon the other, and must even cease its existence whenever the will and pleasure of its superior shall be known. How extraordinary has been the course of opinions upon this subject!

The friends of a bank formerly required for this Government the exercise only of an equal and concurrent power, even not so much; they are now obliged to argue against honorable gentlemen who refused that power, and who now, in effect, contend for the exercise of a superior and exclusive power. If such, then, is intended to be the effect of this bill, and if its provisions are calculated for the attainment of that end, it is most indubitably unconstitutional. If what is termed implication, is to become the lawful proprietor of what she is only permitted to use for a special purpose, and is to bear off, too, what she has no pretence for asking to borrow, all our paper regulations are idle. With an encroaching and restless agency of this kind in the Constitution, there is no limit to the power of this Government. I shall press no further Constitutional objections to this bill, but will now proceed, with the further indulgence of the Senate, to examine the general policy of this measure.

This bill came out of the hands of the Administration ostensibly for the purpose of correcting the diseased state of our paper currency, by restraining and curtailing the over issue of banking paper; and yet it came prepared to inflict upon us the same evil; being itself nothing more than simply a paper-making machine, and constituting in this respect a scheme of policy about as wise, in point of precaution, as the contrivance of one of Rabelais' heroes, who hid himself in water for fear of rain. The disease, it is said, under which the people labor, is the banking fever of the States; and this is to be cured by giving them the banking fever of the United States. To my mind, the real evil consists not so much in a superabundance of paper, as in a scarcity of specie. The paper currency does not exceed what is required to circulate the business of the country; it only wants the accrediting, the quickening, the vivifying principle which it requires a certain proportion of specie to communicate to it. But this bill is to supply that want; it is to be our alchemist, and is to effect for us even the transmutation of paper into gold. How this matter is to be conducted, we have not been told. It is admitted that the great desideratum will not be afforded all at once. The process, we are informed, requires time; but we are assured that, in the end, it will not disappoint our hopes. For one, sir, I am not willing to trust to a scheme of this sort. Not only it is not shown how its professed object is to be accomplished, but the fallacy of its pretensions is susceptible of demonstration. This is to be a specie, or a paper-paying bank. Take either hypothesis—suppose it the former—will it increase the quantity of specie in the country; will it restore to circulation that which is in the country; or will it put into circulation anything that will answer the purpose of specie? That it will increase the quantity of specie, powerful as may be its alchemy, none will pretend. Will it emancipate from restraint what is already in the country? That the quantity of specie in the United States is diminished, is acknowledged, and it will not be denied that a much larger proportion of specie, than formerly was sufficient to maintain the free circulation of bank paper, will be required to revive and establish public confidence in that currency as a steady and certain representative of gold and silver. Those banks, therefore, that have now the precious metals locked up in their vaults, not only will but ought to keep them there, until the necessary addition is made by the course of trade; more especially ought they to do so, at this time, when the course of that trade has thrown the exchange so much against us, that every dollar they paid out would be exported. If this bank is to be a specie bank, will it put into and keep in circulation anything that will answer the purpose of specie? Who are to borrow of this bank, and what will be their inducements to borrow? Those who obtain discounts will receive paper equal in value to gold and silver; and their debts must be paid off, when they become due, not in the notes of other banks, but in the notes of this bank, or in gold and silver. If they borrow for the purpose of obtaining a more equal and unvarying medium, than any other bank paper will afford them, of remittance to any part of the United States, or with a view to purchase cheaper anything they may want to buy, their object is accomplished. But when the time arrives for them to pay off their debts to the bank, they must purchase up the paper of this bank, or gold and silver, with other banking paper, and with the same or a greater loss. What will they then have gained by the transaction? Pay their debts they must, when they become due; and, cost what it will, they must procure the paper of the same bank, or gold and silver. They have gained, say ten per cent. in their remittance, or their purchase, and they must give it up again to obtain the means of paying these debts; and, moreover, run, without any advantage, the risk of being disappointed in procuring those means. There will be, likewise, accompanying this, another operation. Those who borrow (if any under such circumstances will borrow) must have a view to purchase, or remittance to some other part of the Union; and, in that mode, the paper of this bank will get into the hands of persons who have no debts to pay to the bank. What will they do with this paper? Will it come into their possession so utterly untainted with suspicion, with such all-inspiring confidence, as to make the holders of it prefer it to gold and silver? Certainly not. The recollection of recent events, the infirm condition of the other banking paper, will prompt the holders of it to demand immediately in exchange that which they know is immutable in its value. And, moreover, there may be a sudden fluctuation in the rate of foreign exchange, which may communicate to gold and silver a temporary appreciation over the paper currency, without sensibly (if at all) depressing contemporaneously its value in relation to anything else it may command. When this takes place, the holder of the gold and silver obtained from this bank in exchange for its paper, will find a profit between the value at which he received the paper, and the gold which he has obtained for it, sufficient to induce him to part with it for the currency of the other banks; and which profit he can, by investment and purchase, render certain before the impulse of appreciation can be communicated to what he finally obtains. While, therefore, the exchange against the country is progressing, this process will accompany it, and effect the removal abroad of our specie. To emancipate specie from the restraints now imposed upon it, is to permit it to pursue its own course; and that course (in the present state of foreign exchanges) leads it out of the United States; and thus the immediate and inevitable effect of our legislation for restoring specie to circulation, is to send what we have remaining of it out of the country. If in this state of things, then, this bank is to be a specie bank, it can issue paper only to the amount of its specie. It cannot issue paper even to that amount, because there will be no inducement to borrow, upon the terms upon which a specie bank can now alone lend; and even if it could lend out, on these terms, paper to the amount of its specie, it would effect nothing in value towards the great object of this policy. It would be only amusing itself, like Diogenes, who set himself about rolling his tub, rather than be idle while all others were employed. But allow me here, sir, to ask, what is to be done, if this bank, in which we as stockholders are to have so deep an interest, should, as it probably pretty soon will, wade out of its depth; should exhaust its specie, (as it inevitably must do if it issues paper to an amount exceeding, even in a very limited degree, its specie capital,) and become unable to pay its paper? When that happens, as happen it must if there is not a considerable addition to the specie capital of the country, the urgency of the case will make its own law; and it will either be the law of public opinion, of public necessity, and public interest—the same law under which the State banks now operate—or it will be a law of our own enactment, striking off the shackles we are now riveting upon this institution. No, sir, this bill cannot restore the specie in the country to circulation, nor can it dissolve the powerful spell which fear, and suspicion, and even prudence, have placed upon it. Of our capacity to increase its quantity by this bill, we have about as good evidence as the facetious writer before referred to had of his royal descent; he had, he tells us, “a marvellous desire to be a king himself;” we have “a marvellous desire,” I admit, to increase the quantity of specie, and we have no other better way of showing the specie-making tendency of this bill.

I beg leave, sir, to remark upon the distinctly avowed coercive policy in which this bill originated, with a view to considerations that are foreign to the Constitutional question. This bank has an immense capital; and when the state of things in this country shall be better settled; when a favorable course of trade shall have brought us the necessary supplies of specie, the operations of this, and other banks, will be conducted as formerly. This, then, will become a paper making bank, as well as the others; but the excess of all will be guarded against by the necessity which will be imposed of maintaining the principle of convertibility. This new bank, with its branches, will have afforded it by governmental deposits, and the receipt by the United States of the public revenue, in its paper, the means of extending its discounts, and increasing its issues in proportion to its capital, greatly beyond what the other banks can venture to do; and particularly must the operations of the State banks continue very limited and circumscribed, until the first hostile impulse communicated to this institution has ceased to operate, and until due confidence can be inspired that the same vindictive spirit will not again be aroused and inflamed. In this state of things the banking capital you now create will firmly establish itself, and eventually take the place of so much of the capital of the State banks. You create a banking capital beyond what is requisite for the attainment of the lawful ends of this Government, no one having disproved, indeed all seeming to admit, the existence already in the country of a sufficient banking capital. Why, then, is this injustice done, of supplanting one species of banking capital with another? Can we forget that a large proportion of the State banks is the offspring of our own policy? We refused the reincorporation of the old Bank of the United States; we declined altogether the exercise of the authority to establish these institutions, and mainly upon the ground that the power to organize them was exclusively vested in the State governments. This opinion was adopted, and zealously and perseveringly asserted by the most potent States in the Union; and subscribed to, and openly maintained by the most enlightened, the most intelligent, and influential supporters of the present order of things. Hence the origin of a great many of the State banks. The subscribers to those banks, relying upon the soundness, or at least, the permanency of this opinion, purchased their charters of the States; and the public money of those governments has been invested to a large amount in those banks. What, then, can warrant, in a renunciation of former sentiments, the extension of the capital of this bank beyond the proper objects of such a bank? It is equally forbidden by the Constitution, and by the plain principles of common justice. Let the conduct of these institutions (generally speaking) be examined; let it be exposed to the severest scrutiny, and there will be nothing found to justify the severity of this measure. Even if it be admitted that the course of these bodies, set free from the restraints which usually oblige them to revolve in their proper orbits, has been somewhat erratic—what then? Has their course been that of public calamity, and private distress? You must judge of them by the good as well as the evil they have done. They have been the nerve and spring of your industry; they have been the spirit which has animated your enterprise; and if they have been a fountain which has sent out bitter waters, they have sent out sweet waters too. What would have been your condition—what would be our condition this moment, without them? Have they banished the specie from the country? That was the affair of our achievement. This useful friend we lost ourselves; and they have, to the best of their ability, supplied its place. Is it for us to bestow upon them unqualified censure; for us, whose measures annihilated the restraints, and withdrew from them the great security of steadiness and uniformity? Is it for us to condemn them in mass, who were the first to seize with avidity, and to profit to the fullest extent of our influence over them, of the opportunity made by ourselves to lead them astray? Then our conduct to them was “as soft as the tips of our ears;” but now that our purpose is served, “our gorge rises” at them, and in the time of their need, we unhesitatingly devote them to destruction.

I have said, sir, that the evil was not in a superabundance of paper, but in a scarcity of specie; for I think every view taken of the operations of the bank will show, with but few exceptions, that they have not exceeded their proper limits. The first effect of loosening their restraints was not to send them a heedless, headlong course. The influence of habit continued after the necessity which gave it birth had ceased. They went on the same path, and might have been so expected to do for some time by their own momentum. These banks were generally under the direction of able and honest men; not of such as were incapable of appreciating the difficulty and delicacy of their situation, but of men whose prudence, foreseeing the embarrassments they would have to contend with, immediately replaced the restraints which necessity had imposed and maintained. The particular instances of excess which have been referred to are those of exception; and, even in those cases, the business of the banks has fallen below what specie times have witnessed and will warrant; and still further below what this bank, with its paper circulating capacity, will do in such times. What course, different from that which they have taken, would we have had them to pursue in the situation in which they were placed? Ought they, in a time of public and private calamity and distress, have called upon their debtors? Ought their paper to have disappeared in the proportion that specie was withdrawn? And if this ought to have been done, how was the business of the country to have been transacted in the absence of both specie and paper? If these banks had called in their paper as the specie disappeared, and as the necessary demand for it increased—at a time, too, when public confidence, accompanied by public necessity and public convenience, tendered herself ready to perform for this circulation every office of specie—to reanimate it—to breathe into it a new and efficient principle of vitality; if such, under such circumstances, had been the conduct of these banks, we should have been, ourselves, among the loudest to complain. They did then, sir, what they ought to have done. Like wise and prudent men, instead of resisting an evil they could not avert, they did all that was left for them to do; they applied to it the best and only remedy that remained; one which, if it has not cured the disease, has at least alleviated its affliction.

I do not know that there is much hope of effecting the postponement of this measure; yet every consideration belonging to it, every view which can be taken of it, seems to me to require of us the utmost deliberation and circumspection. I know that there is a loose and vague notion afloat in the public mind, of one great uniform national currency. I will not dignify this notion by calling it public opinion. I know, sir, that we are looked to, as were, in other times, "the baker and the baker's son;" but surely the cool and intelligent and enlightened men of our country, who have reflected seriously upon the existing state of things, do not expect relief, in this matter, from our legislation. They know full well how much easier it is to legislate a country into difficulties, than it is to legislate it out of them. They understand the nature of the disease—its cause, and its remedy. They look not to us for health, who have medicined them into sickness. All they ask of us is to desist, "to let them alone." Time is their physician. They want time to recover from us—he has "healing upon his wings," we have none upon ours. Those who know not the cause of our disease—who have been blind to the natural tendency, to this state of things, of the measures which have been pursued for several years back, who know not the agencies which have withdrawn the specie from our country, and who cannot comprehend the influences which have given such activity and effect to those agencies, may have a notion that we can relieve them; and it cannot be expected that the deep responsibility, which is involved by the measures which have led to the present difficulties, should take much pains to dissipate the delusion. If we are to profit by this delusion, which conceals the past from public view, let us not go still further into error. The step we are going to take, we should remember, with the honorable gentleman from New York, (Mr. SAMFORD,) is not one which we can retrace. In common cases, if we commit an error, subsequent legislation can remedy it. Not so here. An error committed, in the passage of this law, is beyond our power to correct. And furthermore, let us specially remember the magnitude of the power which we propose to regulate. It is not merely the banking power of this institution, but the banking power of the States. What is to be the bearing of our legislation upon great interests like these, so closely interwoven as they are with the pursuits of the people, it is incumbent upon us well and maturely to consider. The science of banking, connected as it is, in peace and in war, with the circulating medium, with the various operations of Government, with the different great interests of society in general, with the individual industry and enterprise of the citizens, with the value of other capital, and with the moral character of the people, is a science, like all others, of progressive improvement; and is, perhaps even at this time, but very imperfectly understood by those who have devoted most time to its study. Could, sir, this science now call to her aid, him who wrote upon this subject, "as with a sunbeam"—the justly celebrated author of the "Wealth of Nations"—even this, her favorite son, would be obliged to confess that much of his theory, which the world has so long adopted, was but like "the clouds that gather 'round the setting sun, and seeming only to form 'a part of the brightness, by which they are illumined." Who then, among "us," is entitled to hold the "lamp of truth" to this subject? None of us, it is true, can be blind to the causes of the evil complained of. We know now too well the effect of the bold experiments we have tried upon the people. Tremendous as they were, it required but little skill to make them. But to build up anew what we have broken down, to repair what we have wasted, is an achievement of another sort. Peace, and the uninterrupted pursuits of industry and enterprise spread their blessings around us. Restrictive regulations and war have snatched many of them from us. The price the country has paid for our experiments is gone. If it has not made us wiser, we have nothing in return. What we have lost must be replaced as it was gained. Legislation is the medicament which has made us sick, but it has no charm to restore us to health. One great interest in our country, from sad experience of our measures, has long since learned to look to the period of assembling the National Councils as to the period of national calamity. What Thucydides says of the speech of Alcibiades, turning against his own country and explaining to her enemies her vulnerable positions, "while he speaks she totters," may justly be remarked of too many of our measures—while we legislate the country totters. The great body of our merchants have, in a special manner, cause to tremble at our legislation; that great body of men, whom the swooping denunciation of an honorable member on this floor has this day placed in the most degraded and the most worthless ranks of society. The honorable member makes exceptions, which serve, however, only to set in stronger view the estimate he forms of the rest. Sir, when honorable members of this House, and from great and potent States in the Union, entertain these sentiments, and express them upon this floor, it manifests a hostility to commerce, which justifies all the apprehensions of her friends. It is full time for the merchants—the Morrises and the Fitzsimmonses to take their seats among us, to assert their own character and maintain their own interests. Were they here they would find occasions to tell us, that it is not the farmer, or the country gentleman, the fleeces of whose flocks grow too slow for our Walpoles—that we have repaired to their "altars," not to worship there, but to shut up their "Bible," and bear off their "God;" that the seat of Commerce is not to be found "in the midst of the secret and solitary hill, nor her voice to be heard in the murmur of the mountain stream."

Upon a subject, sir, like that now before us, of a complex and intricate character, having the closest relations to the strongest interests in society; with no special illumination ourselves; in the absence of all practical information; uninspired with much of confidence in our own skill by the success of our former experiments on political economy; is it wise to act at all; but, most especially, upon a subject of this character, is it possible, in the nature of things, for a general legislation, which commits itself to the strong impulse of one given pressure, to pursue the proper course? In circumstances like the present, it is circumspection, it is deliberation which is required, and not action. There are situations of peril in which the soldier halts. There are crises of difficulty and embarrassment in which the statesman pauses. It is folly, it is rashness, and not wisdom, not courage, that marches blindfold upon danger. "It is no inconsiderable part of wisdom to understand how much of an evil is to be endured;" and particularly so, when there is reason to hope that the evil will remedy itself. The existing laws which authorize the issue of Treasury notes, will remove all sectional difficulties, and afford to the people a safe and equal medium for the payment of their taxes.

I rely upon the indulgence of the Senate to excuse my having so long trespassed upon their time. I do not flatter myself with the expectation that my humble views of this subject will have much weight; they are such as have presented themselves to my mind; and, imperfect as they may be, I have obeyed only the sense of duty, in submitting them to the Senate. It remains, sir, to move you, which I now do, that the further consideration of the bill upon your table should be postponed to the first Monday in December next.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House of Representatives have passed a bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment of the United States, for the year 1816;" a bill entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States, for the year 1816;" also, a bill entitled "An act continuing the salaries of certain officers of Government;" in which bills they request the concurrence of the Senate. They have concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act in addition to an act to regulate the Post Office Establishment," with an amendment, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

Mr. DAGGETT submitted the following motion for consideration :

Resolved, That the committee to whom are referred the bills for the admission of the Indiana and Mississippi Territories into the Union, as new States, be, and hereby are instructed to ascertain, and report to the Senate, the actual number of inhabitants in the said Territories respectively; distinguishing the number of free persons, from the number of all other persons.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States," and the amendments agreed to as in Committee of the Whole, having been concurred in with an amendment, Mr. MASON, of New Hampshire, renewed his motion to add to the seventeenth section the following proviso :

"And if the said corporation shall at any time suspend or refuse payment, in gold or silver, of its notes, bills, obligations, or other debts, to such an amount, and for such length of time, as Congress may deem injurious to the United States, in such case Congress may repeal this act and abolish the said corporation, and make such regulations and provisions for the settlement of the affairs and payment of the debts of said corporation, and for distributing its remaining property among the stockholders, as shall be deemed just and proper."

On the question to agree thereto, it was determined in the negative—yeas 14, nays 22, as follows :

NAVIGATION SYSTEM.

The bill "to establish a navigation system for the United States" being under consideration, Mr. HARPER moved to recommit it to the Committee of Foreign Relations, and to refer to the same committee the following resolutions, which he read in his place, and laid on the table, viz:

Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law for excluding gradually from the naval and merchant service of the United States all persons other than native citizens, or citizens heretofore naturalized.

Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law for compelling merchant vessels of the United States to have on board a number of apprentices, in proportion to the tonnage of such vessels, respectively.

Mr. HARPER said, his object in moving this recommitment was to prevail on the Senate, if possible, to remould the bill, so as to incorporate into it the new ideas contained in these resolutions—new, he meant, as respected that bill, though no doubt very familiar within these walls, and to well-informed and reflecting men throughout the country. And as the motion, should it prevail, would give a new shape to the bill, and a new character to our whole maritime system—a character which he deemed it of the highest importance to impart to that great branch of our policy—he thought it incumbent on him to state, somewhat at large, the leading considerations which, in his opinion, recommended this measure. He was sensible that neither those considerations nor the measure itself were new to that House or to the nation. They had often no doubt been the subject of reflection and discussion abroad, and sometimes of deliberation within those walls; but as he—not having then the honor of a seat in that body—had no part in those deliberations, he might perhaps be more readily excused, for occupying some portion of its time with his ideas concerning the great interests involved in the question.

These resolutions, Mr. H. said, (and especially the first, which contained by far the most important principle,) had two distinct objects; each recommended by considerations peculiar to itself, and both tending to the same great end—the honor, safety, and prosperity of the nation. The first was to preserve peace, as far as its preservation might depend on us, by excluding all foreign seamen from our merchant ships, and thus preventing those collisions with the maritime Powers of the world which must of necessity arise from conflicting claims on the ocean to allegiance. The second, to prepare for war, by accelerating the production of a numerous class of native seamen; the most effectual mode of doing which, was to confine the navigation of our ships of war and merchant vessels—as these resolutions proposed to confine it—to our native citizens, and those heretofore naturalized among us. Such, he said, was the twofold object of his motion—to avoid contests with other nations, and especially with that between which and us, from similarity of language, appearance, and pursuits, they were most likely to arise; and to make timely and effectual preparation for maintaining our rights against all nations, and especially that great maritime Power with which, in all probability, we could not long avoid serious collisions; if we would; and perhaps—judging from the temper of a large part of this nation—would not, if we could. From these collisions the resolutions which he had submitted would, in his opinion, have a tendency to save us. So far their operation would be admitted, he presumed, to be highly beneficial. Every measure must be so, that tended, by fair and honorable means, to narrow the ground and diminish the occasions of serious misunderstandings with other Powers. The effect, indeed, would be not complete. Neither this measure nor any other could save us entirely from contests with a Power between which and this country so many fruitful and perennial sources of discord existed; but, it was doing much to diminish the number of those sources, and to dry up one of the most fruitful. This, he believed, would be effected by the resolutions under consideration. How they would produce that effect he would next proceed to consider.

Every honorable gentleman who heard him, knew how the two nations—the United States and Great Britain—stood towards each other, in relation to their maritime policy and pretensions. The United States asserted it as a right, and had established it as a habit, to incorporate foreigners by naturalization into their political association—into the nation—and thus to withdraw them from their allegiance to their native Governments. This practice extended to all the European States, but affected Great Britain more than any other nation, from obvious and well-known causes. We went a step further—we had laid it down as a maxim in our laws and foreign policy that protection is due on the ocean to these naturalized foreigners, against their original Governments, to the same extent as to our native citizens; and this protection we had repeatedly, and in various forms, promised to afford. We had held out to the subjects of every Power—to the people of all nations—a promise of protection against their native Governments, on the ocean as well as on the land, provided they would conform to our laws of naturalization. Thus the matter stood on our part.

The foreign Powers, on the other hand, and particularly Great Britain, had, from time immemorial, adopted it as a maxim of their laws and constitutions, essential, in their opinions, to the preservation of government and civil society, that allegiance is perpetual and unalienable, so far as relates to the mere act of the person who owes it; that every member of the community contracts by his birth obligations of obedience to the laws, and of service and fidelity to the State, from which he cannot withdraw, without the consent of the Sovereign. In fine, that this contract, like all others, can only be dissolved by the consent of both parties—one of whom is the individual or subject, and the other the Sovereign representing the community or State. He would not, he said, now inquire whether, as an abstract principle, this doctrine was correct. The inquiry was unnecessary for his present purpose. Should it ever become necessary, he was prepared to meet the question, and entertained opinions concerning it which he should be ready to avow and maintain. It was sufficient for the present purpose, and must be known by all who heard him, that the Government to which he alluded, and over whose conduct or opinions we had no control, did hold and always had held this doctrine, and had always manifested a fixed determination not to recede from it, or to relinquish the rights to which it gave birth. It was equally well known that many other Governments—nay, he might say all the Governments of the world, except our own; all those at least which belonged to the European system, and with which we had any connexion—held the same principle, and from time to time asserted it, as might happen to suit their interest or their policy. How far we might hereafter find it necessary to adopt and assert this principle ourselves, he deemed it unnecessary now to inquire; though he had a very distinct opinion on that subject, which, on every proper occasion, he should be ready to avow and support. It was enough for us, at present, that Great Britain did assert this principle of perpetual, indissoluble allegiance, and had manifested, on all occasions, a determination to support it, at every hazard.

Knowing then, he said, as we did, this determination, this fixed purpose of that nation, to assert, at every hazard, the right which she thus claimed to the services of all her people whom she could find in merchant ships on the ocean, or in her own territory; knowing, also, the importance which she attached to this right, regarded by her as essential to her prosperity, her safety, and even her existence; the question for us to solve, laying aside all consideration of the soundness of her doctrine, of the abstract right of the case, and looking only to the practical consequences, was this: how far would it be wise in us to engage in a contest with that nation on grounds considered as so doubtful, on principles not acknowledged by any other Power; where the universal opinion of mankind, out of our own country, would be against us, and opinions at home might be very much divided. It was a point on which such a division must be expected; a point on which the most enlightened and patriotic men might entertain, and in fact did entertain, the most opposite opinions; for it was well known that a very large portion of the American people, including many individuals of the highest character for virtue, knowledge, and love of country, were of opinion that one nation had no right, by its naturalization laws or any other means, to withdraw the subjects of another from their allegiance. He did not now intend to inquire into the correctness of this opinion, but merely to advert to the fact that such an opinion was entertained by a very numerous and highly respectable class of our citizens, whose feelings and opinions it was of the highest importance to consult, in order to obtain their zealous co-operation in any struggle that might ensue. Good citizens would always obey the laws; but unless they approved the ground of a war, mere obedience was all that could be expected from them. Zeal, devotedness, voluntary services, and sacrifices of person and property, could only be expected, from men of honorable minds, in a cause which they approved; and there were great numbers of the most honorable and virtuous men of this country who would not and could not approve of any quarrel entered into for the mere purpose, not of vindicating any rights, or redressing any injuries of our own citizens, of the native sons of our soil, but of asserting a right in this country to acquire new citizens, of whom we had no need, by withdrawing foreigners from the power of their own Governments; to confer favors on foreigners, at the expense of the country and its native inhabitants. There were, Mr. H. said, certain principles, affecting the rights of our native citizens, in defence of which he was at all times ready to incur every risk, and brave every danger. Those rights were sacred, and whenever openly assailed must be defended at every hazard. Questions might indeed arise about the nature and extent of some of those rights; but there were others of a nature too clear to be disputed, and too sacred to be touched; which, when openly assailed, must be defended at every hazard, and even when incidentally infringed, through inadvertency, accident, or mistake, claimed the jealous attention and ready interposition of the Government. Without entering into any exact definition of these high and sacred rights, which he did not conceive to be now necessary, it might be remarked that the right of personal liberty, of exemption from compulsory service to a foreign Government, under any form whatever, was among the most undeniable of the number; and there never was a time when he was not ready to resist, to every extremity, any such claim to the service of native American citizens, had such a claim been made by any Government whatever. The claim, however, which was now under consideration, the claim of the British Government to the services of its own subjects, whenever it could find them in merchant ships on the ocean, or in its own ports, was by no means of this description; and the right asserted by this country to protect British subjects and other foreigners, on the ocean, against the claims of their own Governments, was not a right in which our native citizens, the sons of our soil, had any interest. It was a claim for the benefit of foreigners, not always of the most desirable class, who often come to us because they found it inconvenient to remain in their own country; whom we wished to adopt, for their benefit, and not for our own, into our family, and to extend to them not only the privileges but the protection due only to our native sons. It was from the collisions arising out of such a policy that he wished to save the country; collisions dangerous to its peace, not useful to its interests, nor conducive to its honor. He wished, by the measure now proposed, to avoid contests on such grounds; in which we could neither have the approbation and countenance of other nations, nor be united among ourselves. The public opinion of the world was of itself of great importance, and he would sacrifice much to gain it to our cause, in every conflict in which we might be compelled to engage. It was a great moral power, which no wise Government would neglect. But great as it was, he thought it very inconsiderable in comparison with union among ourselves. It was on that union that the force of every nation, and especially of this, living, as we did, under a government of consent which rested wholly on public opinion, must in a most material degree depend. No sacrifices, except those of primary and essential rights, were too great for attaining so desirable an object. The right of which he now proposed to divest ourselves was of a most doubtful character; whether we regarded the right itself, or the expediency of its exercise; and as, notwithstanding all our care, it might not be in our power to avoid serious contests with other nations, and chiefly with that to which he had so often alluded, he wished to put all doubtful causes out of the conflicts to which we might be destined, and so to choose our ground, that all the differences of opinion among ourselves might hereafter be confined to the time of beginning the contest, and the manner of conducting it, but not extend to the right itself for which we were to contend.

There was another view of the subject, Mr. H. said, in which this measure strongly recommended itself to his mind. A new state of things had arisen; we were about to enter on a new career, and before we began it he wished to get entirely rid of this cause of collision with foreign Powers, arising from our claim of right to protect those on the ocean whom they assert a right to consider and treat as their subjects. He called this a new career because, for more than twenty years, a state of things had existed in the world totally different from that at which we now had fortunately arrived. When you and I, sir, said Mr. H., came into life, as public men, we saw the commencement of that state of things which has now passed away, and which gave rise, while it continued, to political systems, views, and opinions, not applicable to the present condition of the world. At the beginning of the period to which I allude, we saw a new and mighty Power struggling into existence, and displaying even then, under the pretence of establishing freedom at home and promoting it abroad, a spirit of gigantic and unprincipled ambition, which soon rendered it the scourge and terror of all surrounding nations. It assailed them all, in turn, with all the weapons of fraud and force, while it loudly stigmatized, as combinations against liberty and national independence, those leagues which its aggressions had compelled them to form for their own defence. This new Power, after pursuing for a while, with wild and revolutionary fury, a plan of universal dominion, but ill concealed though not distinctly avowed, settled down into a military despotism, the most formidable in its means and profligate in its principles that the world has ever seen; which boldly, openly, and steadily, pushed forward the scheme of conquest and universal empire originated by its predecessors; and, after crushing or humbling every Power but one, which alone had the courage and strength to maintain the conflict, bent at length all its vast and accumulated force against that Power, the only remaining obstacle, which alone stood in the breach, struggling to keep up the mound, and to save itself, and with itself, us—and the rest of the world, from the torrent which equally threatened all.

In this state of things, Mr. H. said, there was no room for deliberation, no freedom of choice, no course of conduct but one; and that was, to abstain from every act, however proper in other times, that could then tend to weaken the arm uplifted in the common cause; that might diminish the power exerted for the common defence; or tend to break down or undermine the mound which restrained the mighty torrent, and preserved it from sweeping us and the rest of the world into one common ruin. In such a state of things it was not for nations to act as in ordinary times, or on maxims of ordinary policy. Injuries which in ordinary times were to be vigorously repelled, were then to be patiently borne, on account of the infinitely greater evils which the attempt to repel them might introduce. The utmost indulgence was to be exercised. Every encroachment, that could be made to wear the appearance of right, that did not assume the character of open and direct aggression, was to be borne, rather than to run the risk of weakening those exertions, on which such mighty interests depended.

Now the state of things, he said, was changed. That tremendous power was overthrown, the Government that wielded it had been annihilated, and the nation which supplied its means of power was reduced below its usual and proper level. If danger still existed, it was on the other side. We were no longer called on to bear or forbear; nor to judge of injuries or encroachments by distinct or collateral circumstances. We might now estimate them by their intrinsic nature, and act concerning them upon the ordinary maxims of political wisdom. Those maxims enjoin it on a nation like this, rising rapidly into power and importance, to watch over its rights with a jealous and vigilant care; to regard its honor as inseparably connected with its true interests, and as making a part of its dearest rights; to consider justice as the first of its duties; to advance no claims which were not clear and incontrovertible, and to maintain those with inflexible constancy. This view of things had induced him to regard the nation as entering on a new career, as at the commencement of a new era, and he thought it of the utmost importance that in this state of things we should take no false steps, and assume no questionable ground; that we should so act as to cause it to be distinctly understood, that while the United States would submit to no intentional injury, nor suffer even any accidental trespass to pass without notice, and if need be redress, they would carefully avoid all interference with the rights of others, and assert no claims but such as were clear and important. This was the position which he wished this country to take, and to maintain, in the commencement of the new era now opening before them. Here in his opinion they ought to plant their foot; and having chosen well their ground, with a view to the rights and feeling of other nations as well as their own, to stand on it immoveably, prepared for every consequence. On such ground the resolutions which he had moved would in his opinion place them. By excluding the subjects of other Powers from our ships of war and merchant vessels, we would avoid all collision with them on the ocean, upon this delicate point; all interference with a claim of allegiance, to which they attach so much importance, and have displayed so firm a determination to maintain. Having done this we shall stand perfectly free, with the world and ourselves, to resist steadily and effectually any encroachments which they may attempt, on our acknowledged and important rights, and all such encroachments he for one should be always ready to resist, to the utmost extremity, in whatever quarter they may be attempted.

While we took this view, Mr. H. said, of the very doubtful right of withdrawing foreigners from their allegiance to their Governments, and protecting them on the ocean against claims arising out of that allegiance; a right, in his opinion, not only extremely doubtful but very unimportant; he wished distinctly to mark out two classes of emigrants, as exceptions from his motion and his reasoning.

The first class was that of foreigners heretofore naturalized. Whatever might be, in point of abstract principle, the correctness or incorrectness of our conduct, in passing those laws under which foreigners had been incorporated into our nation, by which they had in effect been invited and encouraged to come among us, we could not now suffer it as to them to be made a question. Those laws had operated as an invitation to emigrants, and as a promise of protection against their native governments. Perhaps they were intended so to operate; but however that might be, such undoubtedly had been their effect. We had invited these strangers, whether wisely or properly was not now the question, to take sanctuary in our land, and promised them protection on board of our ships. We could not now abandon them without dishonor. Our word was out, and we must protect them at all events. We must redeem our pledge; and Mr. H. said that he was ready at any moment to draw the sword in defence of this class of citizens, the citizens heretofore naturalized, whose rights he would never suffer to be drawn into question. He would say, in the commencement of any negotiation, "This ground is sacred and must not be touched. Our faith is pledged, and must be redeemed." He had accordingly provided in the first resolution for this class of citizens.

The second class, he said, need hardly be mentioned; so obvious were the principles by which it was protected. It consisted of those foreigners, whether naturalized or not, who remained within our territory. They were protected by our territory while they so remained, because within our territory no foreign Power could exercise any jurisdiction, or exert any act of authority whatever. We therefore extend protection to such persons, in the usual exercise of our rights of sovereignty, and as a necessary consequence of those rights, while they reside in our country, and remain on our soil. When they choose to depart, the protection ceases. The general proposition, therefore was to be understood as subject to those two exceptions; one of which indeed was incorporated into the resolutions themselves, and the other was so obvious, that nothing but a desire to avoid all possibility of being misunderstood, in a matter of so much delicacy, would have induced him to advert to it thus particularly. Indeed, it might be remarked that this principle of public law was of such universal operation, that persons guilty of the greatest crimes, murder for instance, and even treason, if they could escape from the country where those crimes were committed, into a foreign territory, found protection and immunity; and nothing but special provisions by treaty could control the operation of this general law. This doctrine was exemplified in the history of every country and every age.

Mr. H. then proceeded to the second division of the subject, which he observed was by far the most important. He had hitherto considered the resolutions in their tendency to preserve us in peace, by removing one great ground of controversy with foreign Powers, and especially with Great Britain, and to unite us at home in such conflicts or other grounds as we might be unable to avoid. He would now consider them in their tendency to prepare us effectually for war. It would, he presumed, be admitted by all, that we ought to make betimes the most efficient preparations for those great conflicts with other Powers to which we were called by our destiny. The United States could not expect to remain always at peace. Perhaps they ought not to desire it; for long-continued peace enervates, corrupts, and debases a nation, and prepares it for subjugation, by rendering it too timid, too avaricious, and too effeminate to defend itself. Be that, however, as it may, continual peace was not in our power, and therefore we ought to look to frequent wars, and prepare for them. They would grow out of our habits, our pursuits, our character, our form of government, and our situation with respect to the great maritime Powers of the world. Our people were too enterprising, too active, too eager in the pursuit of commercial gain, to remain quietly at home. Inhabiting a most extensive seacoast, bred and almost born on the ocean, they were naturally impelled to maritime enterprise. Their free institutions gave them a bold and adventurous spirit. Their equality of civil and political rights rendered them eager for the acquisition of wealth, because that acquisition placed them on a footing of absolute equality with those who possessed the greatest advantages. Commerce and maritime adventure opened to them, to all that numerous part of them at least that dwelt on the Atlantic shore, the nearest and most flattering prospect of wealth. All these causes impelled us to the ocean, and sent us in quest of gain through every sea and to the remotest shores. Our free Government, while it generated and fostered a spirit of restless and daring adventure, left us unrestrained to the bent of our character and inclinations; for it had no power, except under very particular circumstances of rare occurrence, to mould and direct the industry and pursuits of the nation. It received its tone and character from public sentiment, which, instead of leading it, must generally follow. Hence arose maritime and commercial pursuits of unexampled activity, ardor, and extent; and while we spread our ships over every sea, and eagerly sought every market which afforded even a distant prospect of gain, we were necessarily and frequently brought into contest and collision with other nations engaged in similar pursuits, especially that nation whose character and situation in these respects were so much like our own. With that nation, therefore, we must at every turn cross and clash. And to these inherent causes of difference many others might be added, of a peculiar nature, which need not be enumerated, because they would readily occur to every reflecting mind. Some of them were minute and even trivial, though well suited to produce irritation. Others lay much deeper, and being intimately connected with the great and essential interests of the two nations, real or supposed, could hardly fail to produce the most serious contests, capable of being adjusted only by the sword. Many of the maritime pretensions of that great Power were of this description. They need not be named, because they were in every one's recollection; but it might safely be said that they were of a nature to which this country, in the ordinary state of the world, which was its actual state, never would or could submit. This nation was too proud, too ambitious, too enterprising, either to consent that its people should be kept at home, or that their intercourse with other countries should be controlled, restrained, or regulated by any power whatever. Judging from what has happened, and from the principles which we know to be held and asserted by the great Power to which he had alluded, we could not but know that attempts at this restraint and control will be made. Thus we should be driven into the conflict, whatever care we might take to avoid it. Perhaps we ought not to wish to avoid it, for peace is not always the best thing for a nation; but whatever might be our wishes, it would not be long in our power. Collisions would take place, explanations and reparations would be demanded, perhaps not always in the most conciliatory and moderate tone. They would sometimes be given, as often happens, in such a manner as to make matters worse. Resort would then be had to arms, and thus we should soon be driven or drawn into every quarrel among the great maritime Powers. We should be impelled to join the weaker side, because on that side our alliance would be courted, our principles acknowledged, and our pride flattered. It would also be our interest to unite with the weaker maritime Powers in their efforts to check and restrain the lofty pretensions and overbearing domination of the strongest. This, he said, was the natural and constant course of things, which had been for a long time suspended by the extraordinary state of the world, but had now returned to its usual channel; and thus, by a destiny which we could not control, we should become parties in every contest among the maritime Powers. From being parties, we should gradually become principals, and find ourselves at length at the head of the league.

Since then, he said, it was our destiny to fight, it became us to consider in time how we might fight most advantageously, and best prepare for the struggles which we could not avoid. He had no doubt that our true policy and the character of our people led us to the ocean, as the proper field of contest, which was equally pointed out by the nature and genius of our Government. That was the natural and most efficacious direction of our force. It was there that the character of the country had been most nobly sustained; that the most brilliant triumphs had been achieved; that the fairest presages of future glory had been given. The mistakes of rulers might sometimes send our brave sons to perish, in fruitless expeditions by land, among the snows and damp and dreary forests of the North, or in the pestilential swamps and morasses of the South, but the irresistible force of circumstances would soon correct their errors, and recall us to the ocean, as the true scene of our power and glory.

Since it was on maritime power, therefore, that we must rely, to maritime exertions that we should be irresistibly impelled, it behooved us to consider what were the best and most efficient means of maritime force, what was its most solid basis. Was it ships? No. Money? No. What then? He would answer, that it was a brave, hardy, and numerous class of native and patriotic seamen, bound to us by the ties of birth, education, early habit; impelled by the feelings of patriotism and the love of glory; a class of men without which ships are useless, and which money cannot buy. And can you, he asked, rely on foreigners for this all-important aid? On men attracted to your service by the mere desire of wages or of gain, connected with you by no common interests or feelings, united to you by no ties of kindred or affection, mere birds of passage, which flock to your shores in the summer of peace and prosperity, and fly from you when the storm begins to howl? Danger scares them away. These men, thrown on our shores in time of peace by their own Governments who wish to get rid of the expense of maintaining them, enticed to us by the hope of high wages and easy service, when we happen to be neutral, and their own Governments at war, fly when danger approaches, and leave us defenceless, as far as our defence may depend on them. On whom, then, can the country rely? To whom must it look in the hour of danger? I answer to our native citizens, attached to us by birth, education, habit, and domestic ties. These are our sure dependence. They will not leave us in the time of trial, for their affections are with us, their hearts are with us, their parents and their children are with us. On them we may rely in our greatest extremity.

It was the object of his motion, Mr. H. said, to foster the growth of this inestimable class of men, and thus to make the best, the most effectual, and extensive preparation for supporting our rights on the ocean, where alone they would be effectually asserted. He wished to encourage the manufacture of native American seamen, the only production which he was willing to force, by any species of what is called protecting duty. Since there was a sort of rage for encouraging manufactures, he wished to give it a right direction by encouraging the growth, not of wool-carders and cotton-spinners, of deformed, feeble, and diseased laborers in work-shops and factories, but of hardy, gallant, and active seamen, to man our navy; and, by protecting our commerce on the ocean, to enable us to import from other countries those articles which could not be produced among ourselves, without forcing them by oppressive taxes on nine-tenths of the community for the benefit of the other tenth. This, in his opinion, was the true way of encouraging industry and promoting the solid and lasting prosperity of the country; to protect all, and leave all to seek the most profitable modes of employing their skill, labor, and capital. This protection could only be afforded by a powerful marine, which would enable our commerce to seek the most profitable markets for our own productions, and to supply us on the best terms with those of other countries. Every branch of industry would then find and preserve its proper level. To the formation of such a marine, a sufficient supply of native American freemen was essential, and that supply it was the object of his motion to secure. An object in his opinion of the greatest importance in every point of view, which would, he hoped, be deemed a sufficient apology on his part for having occupied so much of the time of that honorable body in this feeble, and, he feared, ineffectual attempt to procure the adoption of the measure under consideration.

With respect to the manner of carrying this measure into effect, so as to obtain the object ultimately, and in the shortest practicable time, without producing derangement in our commercial operations, or serious embarrassment to our ship owners, which he was sensible must be the consequence of precipitation, in every measure of this sort, he considered this as matter of detail, into which he did not intend then to enter. It would be proper and even necessary in the future stages of the business.

All that he now desired was to refer the proposition to the committee, which had reported the bill then before the Senate, and had long had this whole subject under consideration. Here the measure would undergo a full examination with a view both to its practicability, its expediency, and the details of its execution. A report on the subject would then bring the whole matter again before the Senate, with all the facts and explanations necessary for a proper decision.

On the second resolution, for requiring merchant ships to have apprentices on board, he observed that little need now be said. Its object was the same with the first, to provide in time the means of naval power, by promoting the growth of native seamen; and it would be found, he believed, powerfully conducive to that end. It was a measure sanctioned by long experience, in other maritime countries, and especially in Great Britain; in whose practice and institutions we might expect to find the most useful lessons in the art of advancing naval power. The only points therefore for the consideration of the Committee, should his motion of recommitment and reference prevail, would be to what extent, and under what modifications, the measure of requiring apprentices ought to be adopted, and what were the best means of insuring its success, consistently with the state of the country, and the nature of our institutions.

Mr. HARPER then concluded with moving that the bill "to establish a system of navigation for the United States be recommitted to the Committee of Foreign Relations; and that the resolutions, which he had laid on the table, be referred to the same committee, for consideration and report."

In the debate which ensued on this motion, Mr. KING adverted in terms of very strong disapprobation to that part of the British practice of impressment which constitutes their naval officers, and frequently those of very inferior rank, judges in the last resort, on the question whether a seaman claiming to be a native American citizen was so or not; which enables this petty officer, frequently little better than the commander of a press-gang, to decide without evidence, without inquiry, and without appeal, on the dearest rights which belong to a freeman—his right of personal liberty; and to condemn him without a hearing to a rigorous confinement and most irksome servitude on board of a foreign ship of war. This practice Mr. K. censured in terms of severe and just reprehension, declaring that it was intolerable in principle, and had been to a great extent abused in practice, though not so great as had sometimes been stated, by impressing and detaining native American citizens, under pretence of their being British subjects. From the general cast of Mr. K.'s observations on this point, he appeared to be under the impression that Mr. HARPER considered this part of the British practice of impressment as correct, or at least as proper to be tolerated.

Mr. HARPER in explanation observed, that he was very sorry to find himself misunderstood in such a point by the honorable gentleman from

New York, for whose opinions he felt the highest deference and respect. He had not deemed it necessary, from the general course of his observations in support of his motion, to enlarge particularly on the subject alluded to by the honorable gentleman, but he had supposed that his ideas on that point were clearly conveyed by strong and necessary implication from the general tenor of his arguments. Since that however appeared not to be the fact, he would ask leave of the Senate to explain himself more fully, for it was a point on which of all others he was least willing to be misunderstood. He therefore stated distinctly what he had thought sufficiently clear, that he entirely concurred with the honorable gentleman from New York, in the opinions and feelings which he had so forcibly expressed, concerning the British practice in question—the practice of erecting their inferior naval officers, or any of their officers however high in rank, into judges upon the dearest and most sacred rights of American citizens, the rights of personal freedom, with power to decide in the last resort, without evidence and without a hearing, and to carry their own unjust sentences into immediate execution, by dragging the unhappy victims into compulsory service on board of a foreign ship of war, perhaps the enemy of this country. This practice, he agreed with the honorable gentleman, ought to be resisted at every hazard and to the last extremity; and to put ourselves in a condition to resist it effectually, was one great object of the resolutions which he had submitted. It was only, in his opinion, after having excluded British subjects from our merchant ships, that we could correctly and effectually resist their claim, of a right to come on board those ships in search of their subjects. If we chose to receive their subjects on board, and then told them that we would protect all who were on board, or all but those whom we or the commanders of our merchant ships might think fit to acknowledge to be British subjects, and to give up as such, it was obvious that we should do exactly what we so justly complained of in them. We should take upon ourselves, or confer on the commanders of our merchant vessels, the power of deciding in the last resort, with or without evidence, and with or without a hearing, who were to be considered as British subjects, and to execute the sentences, by withholding from the power and service of their own Government all those British subjects whom such judges might think fit to declare American citizens. To such a course of proceeding the British Government could not be expected to submit. They would resist it, and thus we should be involved in a quarrel, on grounds, to say the least of them, exceedingly doubtful, which it was most desirable to avoid. But if his measure were adopted, and all British subjects not heretofore naturalized were excluded from our ships, we should be in a situation to resist their whole practice of impressment, as applicable to our ships, on the most clear and solid grounds; and thus cut up the evil by the roots. We shall be able to say to them “we have none of your ‘subjects on board of our ships, no persons to whose service you can claim a right, and therefore on board of our ships you must not come.’ We shall then have drawn a clear line of demarcation which we shall be able and I trust ever willing to defend. I can assure the honorable gentleman that I for one will go as far and stand as long in its defence as any one who hears me. Let us once exclude British subjects not already naturalized from our ships, and thus deprive that Government of all fair pretence for sending their officers on board, and I for one will join in resisting to every extremity this practice, which will then assume the character of an undisguised attack on our rights, and even on our independence. But it cannot have that character, while we receive their subjects into our merchant vessels, however liable it may be to occasional abuse.’ I wish in this particular, as in every other, to put ourselves perfectly on the right side, so as to avoid the contest if we can, and if we cannot, to begin it with justice clearly on our side; and this, Mr. President, I consider as one of the best effects of my motion, and perhaps its strongest recommendation.

When Mr. HARPER had concluded, the Senate adjourned.

Mr. Johnson, of Kentucky, Mr. Barbour, Mr. Moore, of South Carolina, Mr. Forsyth, Mr. Desha, Mr. Champion, and Mr. Hulbert, were appointed a committee pursuant to the second resolution.

Mr. Pleasants, Mr. Middleton, Mr. Cooper, Mr. Parris, Mr. Hammond, Mr. Boss, and Mr. McLean, of Kentucky, were appointed a committee pursuant to the third resolution.

Mr. Calhoun, Mr. Macon, Mr. Pleasants, Mr. Hopkinson, Mr. Robertson, Mr. Tucker, and Mr. Pickering, were appointed a committee pursuant to the fourth resolution.

Mr. Creighton, Mr. Lowndes, Mr. Cooper, Mr. Ingham, Mr. Condict, Mr. Lovett, and Mr. Alexander, were appointed a committee, pursuant to the fifth resolution.

Mr. Wilde, Mr. Sergeant, Mr. Calhoun, Mr. Sheffey, Mr. Herbert, Mr. Savage, and Mr. Ormsby, were appointed a committee pursuant to the sixth resolution.

Mr. Clark, of Kentucky, Mr. Taylor, of New York, Mr. Kerr, of Virginia, Mr. Piper, Mr. Moore, of South Carolina, Mr. Breckenridge, and Mr. Forney, were appointed a committee pursuant to the seventh resolution.

Mr. GHOLSON suggested a doubt whether these resolutions embraced a subject of very great importance, which was recommended by the President to their attention. He referred to the authority which, in the view of the President, ought to be given to the Executive of the United States efficiently to command the services of the militia in the cases contemplated by the Constitution.

Mr. TAYLOR referred to the Message to show that, by necessary connexion, this topic was included in the general terms of the resolution (as above) which relates to the organization of the militia. It was therefore in his opinion already committed. If at any future day an express instruction on that head to the committee should be found to be necessary, it could then be given.

Mr. WRIGHT said there was another very important subject adverted to by the President which was not embraced, he believed, in the resolutions just adopted; though he was not certain it was not, because he could not distinctly understand them by casually hearing them read and decided on without previous notice. He referred to the recommendation to provide for the payment of the militia called into service during the late war, without the authority of the United States. This was a subject he had much at heart, not only as respected the State he represented, but other parts of the Union, whose militia had promptly turned out to meet the enemy before the authority of the United States could be put in motion to guide their zeal. It was due to the militia who fought for the country that they should be paid; it was due to the magnanimity of the nation that it should make the payment from the National Treasury. In the part of the State which he represented, all the military duties during the war had been performed at the instance of the militia officers, the country being so cut off by the bay from the seats of both the State and General Governments, as to prevent prompt communication with them. The recommendation on this subject contained in the Message was one which, he said, did great credit to the head and heart of the Executive, and he hoped the House would not overlook or slight it, &c.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, observed that he thought it would be better to defer the examination of this subject until brought before the Congress in some shape by the parties concerned. If these separate exertions of patriotism required compensation, they would be brought before Congress in the form of memorials, from the States or individuals who had made them. Thus brought before Congress, the subject might be referred to a committee and generally and fully examined.

Mr. WRIGHT, after some further remarks, submitted the following motion :

"That so much of the President's Message as relates to the arrangement of the militia expenses, incurred by the several State Governments, without the previous sanction or authority of the Government of the United States, be referred to a select committee."

This motion was agreed to, nem. con.; and Messrs. WRIGHT, BARBOUR, RICE, POWELL, SMITH of Pennsylvania, LYON, and CILLEY, were appointed the committee.

Mr. P. BARBOUR, of Virginia, said there was another subject of importance referred to in the Message, which he wished to bring to the view of the House, that, if not included in the references already made, it might be referred to a committee. He meant the payment of the expenses of the militia called out regularly under the authority of the United States, who had not yet been paid, in consequence of the deficiency in the amount of appropriations for that object. He had actual knowledge of the fact of many militia thus situated, remaining unpaid, and seriously suffering for the want of what was justly due them. From the correspondence between the Pay Department and the Militia Officers, which he had seen published, the delay of payment was produced by the exhaustion of the appropriations of the last session. This defect, if existing, should be immediately supplied. To bring this question before the House, he moved—

“That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire whether the appropriation of money made at the last session of Congress, for defraying the expenses of the militia called into the service of the United States, under the authority of the several States, be sufficient; and, if not, what is the amount of the deficiency.”

Mr. LOWNDES suggested that the Committee of Ways and Means, when appointed, would not have it in their power to act on the subject proposed to be referred to them, until the report of the Secretary of the Treasury should be received. That report, which would probably afford all the information the gentleman desired, might be expected in a few days; and, upon that report it would of course become the duty of the Committee of Ways and Means to act, without a particular reference.

Mr. BARBOUR, then, observing that he had but desired to bring this subject directly to the view of the House, waived his motion for the present.

THURSDAY, December 7.

Several other members, to wit: from Massachusetts, SAMUEL TAGGART and LABAN WHEATON; from New York, ASA ADGATE; and from Pennsylvania, HUGH GLASGOW, appeared, produced their credentials, were qualified, and took their seats.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, presented a petition of Westel Willoughby, junior, praying to be admitted to a seat in the House, in the place of William S. Smith, returned as one of the members for the State of New York, whom he alleges to have been unduly returned.—Referred to the Committee on Elections.

THE NEW BUILDING.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the committee on the subject, delivered in the following report:

“The committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to inquire, in conjunction with a committee on the part of the Senate, into the state of the new building on Capitol Hill, offered by the proprietors for the accommodation of Congress, upon what terms the said building could be obtained until the Capitol may be ready for their reception, report: That, having examined the building in question, they consider it much better adapted to the convenience of both Houses of Congress than that they at present occupy. The committee appointed by the owners of the building, have represented it as having cost (with the land attached to it) thirty thousand dollars, five of which has been expended on objects necessary for the accommodation of Congress, which will become useless when they shall leave the building. This committee have stated that the proprietors will be fully satisfied to enter into a contract with the United States under which they shall receive $5,000, with an annual rent of $1,650, (being an interest upon their capital of six per cent., with the addition of the price of insurance,) making the lease determinable at the pleasure of Congress. Should these terms be acceded to by Congress, the committee believe that the building will be ready for their reception on Monday next. The terms appear to the committee of both Houses to be equitable, and they have submitted a bill to carry them into effect.”

Mr. LOWNDES then reported a bill to authorize the President of the United States to lease, on the terms therein mentioned, “the new building on Capitol Hill, with the appurtenances, for the better accommodation of Congress;” which was twice read, referred to a Committee of the Whole; passed through a Committee of the Whole, engrossed, and read a third time, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

Mr. WILDE offered the following resolution, as an amendment to the rules and orders of the House, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table:

SMITH, 2,466 for Westel Willoughby, jr., 309 for Westel Willoughby, and seven scattering votes; that it is proved, the error of the omission of the word "junior," to a part of the returns, was committed by the returning officers, the votes having in fact been given for Westel Willoughby, junior. SETTLERS IN MISSOURI.

Mr. EASTON moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what alterations and amendments are necessary to be made in the law giving the right of pre-emption to settlers on the public lands in the Territory of Missouri.

A motion was made by another gentleman to amend the same by adding thereto the words, "and also in the Territories of Illinois and Indiana." Upon which motion

Mr. EASTON observed, that the law giving the right of pre-emption to the settlers on the public lands in the Illinois Territory had been amended at the last session. He was not, however, opposed to the proposed inquiry; that the object of the resolution offered by him was to place those settlers on the public lands in the Missouri Territory upon a similar footing to such settlers on the Illinois Territory; that the law of Congress of April 12, 1814 gave to the settlers on the public lands, in the Territory of Missouri, the right of pre-emption in the purchase thereof upon the same terms as is granted to settlers of the like description in the Illinois Territory, by the act of the 5th of February, 1813, which had been amended at the last session of Congress. By a reference to the last mentioned act of Congress, it would be found that no person can purchase, under the provision of the act, more than one quarter section of land, and that to be bounded by the sectional and quarter sectional lines; that by those acts of Congress, no provision has been made in favor of settlers upon fractional sections, of less quantity than one hundred and sixty acres, and fractional quarter sections; that by the general provisions made by law, the officers of the land offices are prohibited to sell lands in less quantity than tracts of one hundred and sixty acres; that in the Indiana Territory the lands had been surveyed, and the settlers then located themselves within certain known boundaries; that it was not so in Missouri Territory, where the private claims to land had been adjusting for more than twelve years, and the public lands are not yet surveyed; many persons had settled under Spanish grants, some of which had been annulled by the Government; that among the numerous private claims there would be found a great many fractional sections and fractional quarters of less quantity than one hundred and sixty acres, upon which persons are settled; and the object of the resolution offered by him was to secure to each settler on the public lands his improvement in that Territory.

The amendment was adopted and the resolution agreed to.

THURSDAY, December 14.

The following resolution was submitted by MR. EATON, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of regulating by law the leasing and working the public lead mines in the Territory of Missouri, in such manner as to secure the lessees in the quiet enjoyment of their leases, and to enable the Government to collect its rents.

On motion of MR. McLEAN, of Ohio, the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims were instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing by law the appointment of suitable persons for the payment of military pensions, within those States where Commissioners of Loans are not appointed.

DISTRICT JUDGES.

MR. GOLD offered for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire as to the judicial duties of the respective district judges of the United States, whether the same have been in certain districts greatly increased since the establishment of the salaries of the judges therein; and whether the compensation at present allowed by law be adequate to the discharge of the duties enjoined upon the judges.

MR. GOLD remarked, in support of this motion, that when the compensation of the district judges had been fixed, it was no doubt adequate to the services that they then had to perform; but it was very notorious that the duties had increased in some districts in a fourfold degree. Such had been the increase of the business of the district judge in New York State, that it had been found necessary by Congress to divide the State into two districts. The act for that purpose, however, contained a provision that in case the judge of one of those districts should be unable to attend to the duties of his office, the judge of the remaining district should perform the duties of both. Now, the fact was, that the judge of one of those districts had been wholly unable to attend his judicial duties; in consequence of which the duties of that district had devolved on the judge of the other. He was, by this circumstance, obliged to travel two thousand miles a year, at an expense which nearly absorbed, in necessary travelling expenses, the whole amount of his salary. As there might be other districts in the same situation, he had couched the motion in terms so general as would embrace all.

The resolution was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL MILITARY APPROPRIATIONS.

On motion of Mr. LOWNDES, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill making additional appropriations for defraying the expenses of the army and militia during the years 1814 and 1815.

Mr. LOWNDES explained briefly the object of the bill. The deficiency in the present year's appropriations, arose from the error in estimating the expense at four millions only, barely enough for the support of ten thousand men, when, in fact, for the principal part of the first two quarters of the year more than four times that number ought to have been provided for. The deficiency of preceding years, it was well known, was caused by the heavy expenses of large detachments of militia, exceeding the estimate which had been made, &c. Mr. L. handed to the Chair, for the information of the House, the following letter from the Paymaster of the Army to the Secretary of War, which was read:

ARMY PAY OFFICE,
CITY OF WASHINGTON, Dec. 16, 1815.

SIR: From the best calculations I have been able to make, the deficiency of appropriations for the regular Military Establishment for the year 1814, may be estimated at eight hundred thousand dollars, namely:

On account of pay - - - -	$615,000
On account of subsistence of officers, including their private servants - -	85,000
On account of retained bounties to recruits - - -	100,000
	$800,000

And for the year 1815, at one million seven hundred thousand dollars, namely:

On account of pay - - - -	$1,250,000
On account of the subsistence of officers, including their private servants - -	150,000
On account of retained bounties to recruits - - -	300,000
	$1,700,000

Forming an aggregate arrearage for these two years of two million five hundred thousand dollars, viz:

On account of pay - - - -	$1,865,000
On account of the subsistence of officers, including their private servants - -	235,000
On account of retained bounties to recruits - - -	400,000
	$2,500,000

A further sum of three million five hundred thousand dollars is also estimated to meet, in part, the outstanding claims of militia, volunteers, and Indian warriors, heretofore called into the service of the United States, exclusive, however, of the claims of certain States for expenditures upon their militia, which are not yet duly recognised on the part of the United States. It may be classed as follows:

On account of pay - - - -	$3,095,000
On account of the subsistence of officers, including their private servants - -	265,000
On account of forage, of the horses of officers only - - - -	60,000
On account of the clothing of officers' private servants - - - -	80,000
	$3,500,000

To give you a more condensed view of the preceding statements, the following recapitulation is submitted:

Pay of regular troops - - - -	1,865,000
Pay of militia, &c - - - -	3,095,000
	4,960,000
Subsistence of regular troops - - - -	235,000
Subsistence of militia, &c. - - - -	265,000
	500,000
Forage of militia, &c. - - - -	60,000
Clothing of militia, &c. - - - -	80,000
Retained bounties to recruits for the regular service - - - -	400,000
	$6,000,000

I am, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

ROBERT BRENT,
Paymaster U. S. Army.

Hon. WM. H. CRAWFORD,
Secretary of War.

On motion of Mr. LOWNDES, the blanks in the bill were so filled as to embrace the following appropriations:

For the Quartermaster's department - - - -	$950,000
For the pay of the army and militia - - - -	5,617,000
For the subsistence of the army and militia - - -	2,310,372
For forage - - - -	60,000
For clothing - - - -	108,000
For bounties and premiums - - - -	400,000
For the Medical and Hospital departments - - -	100,000
For fortifications - - - -	200,000
For the Ordnance department - - - -	140,000

Mr. SHARPE moved to strike out of the bill the words "during the years 1814 and 1815," on the ground that the insertion of these years would exclude claims of prior date, which he knew to be yet unsatisfied, though recognised by the Government as just; among these, he particularly mentioned the case of the men who served in General Hopkins's expedition. He presumed it to be the intention of the bill to include all claims remaining unpaid; with which object the language of the bill did not correspond.

Mr. LOWNDES disavowed any intention to exclude any just claims from payment; nor did he think such would be the effect of the present phraseology. The accounts of the department were kept under a general head for each item, without making any discrimination as to the date of its becoming due. These appropriations would of course go to the general heads, and be equally subject to all claims, of whatever date.

Mr. SHARPE replied, but his motion was overruled by the House by a majority of two.

The bill having been reported to the House, Mr. SHARPE moved to lay the bill on the table, to give an opportunity to ascertain from the War Department the fact in relation to outstanding claims prior to 1814; but after some conversation this motion was withdrawn; and,

By consent of Mr. LOWNDES, the bill was so amended by the House as to read, "during the late war," instead of "during the years 1814 and 1815."

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time; and was subsequently read a third time, and passed.

TUESDAY, December 19.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, reported a bill for the relief of Thomas and John Clifford, Elisha Fisher & Co., Thomas Clifford, and Thomas Clifford and Son; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Thursday next.

Mr. YANCEY, from the Committee of Claims, made a detailed report on the petition of Jonathan B. Eastman, which was read; when Mr. Y. reported a bill for the relief of Jonathan B. Eastman, which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. YANCEY made a report in detail upon the petition of Jabez Hull, which was read, when Mr. Y. also reported a bill for the relief of Jabez Hull, which was read twice, together with the report last aforesaid, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. YANCEY also reported a bill to authorize the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy while in the military service of the United States; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole tomorrow.

Mr. REYNOLDS submitted the following resolution, which was read and rejected by the House:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reducing the price of public lands, and report by bill or otherwise.

On motion by Mr. EASTON, the House proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by him yesterday, and the same being again read, was modified and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public

Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for better regulating the leasing and working the public lead mines and salt springs belonging to the United States, in such manner as to protect the lessees in the quiet enjoyment of their leases, and to enable the Government to collect its rents.

WEDNESDAY, December 20.

Two other members, to wit: from New York, VICTORY BIRDSEYE, and from Kentucky, SAMUEL MCKEE, appeared, produced their credentials, were qualified, and took their seats.

Mr. HULBERT presented a petition of the manufacturers of cotton goods in the county of Berkshire, and State of Massachusetts, praying that measures may be adopted to preserve and encourage the cotton manufacturing establishments within the United States.—Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of the infirm, disabled, and superannuated officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary war, the late war, and the army of the United States, for the time being; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Jona. B. Eastman; which was passed through the committee and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for the relief of Jabez Hull took the same course, after some debate on a fruitless attempt of Mr. TAYLOR to obtain a recommitment of the bill, with a view to make it more comprehensive.

THURSDAY, December 21.

Two members, to wit: from Rhode Island, JAMES B. MASON, and from New York, PETER H. WENDOVER, appeared, produced their credentials, were qualified, and took their seats.

Mr. HULBERT presented a petition of a committee appointed by the breeders of Merino sheep, and manufacturers of fine woollen cloths, residing in the county of Berkshire, and State of Massachusetts, praying that such measures may be adopted as will afford security and encouragement to the enterprise in which they are engaged.—Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. HOPKINSON presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of Philadelphia, praying for the establishment of a National Bank.—Referred to the Committee on the subject of an Uniform National Currency.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill "making additional appropriations to defray the expenses of the army and militia of the United States during the late war," with amendments, in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

DECEMBER, 1815.

Congressional Reservation.

H. OF R.

The said amendments were then read and concurred in by the House.

Mr. YANCEY, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of Caleb Earl and John Keen, of Philadelphia, who pray indemnification from the Government for the loss of a vessel; which, having been embargoed, fell into the hands of the enemy at Alexandria. The report recommended that "the prayer of the petitioners ought not to be granted;" and was concurred in.

Mr. YANCEY also made a report on the petition of John Armstrong, of Tennessee, who prays to be allowed certain commissions on internal revenue collected. The report is adverse to his prayer, and was concurred in.

Mr. YANCEY also made report on the petition of Mr. John King, of the Northern Neck of Virginia, who prayed that his house, wantonly destroyed by the enemy in one of their predatory incursions during the late war, (at the same time that he was kidnapped and carried off to Halifax,) may be rebuilt by Government. The report is wholly adverse, on principle, to the prayer of the petition, and was concurred in.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an annual statement of the duties and customs for the year 1814, and of the sales of public lands for the year ending the 30th of September, 1815; and also a statement of the proceeds of the internal duties and direct tax, stating the amount due, and the amount paid, and the expenses of collection, in each collection district within the United States; which documents were, on motion of Mr. MILNOR, all ordered to be printed.

A letter was received from the Secretary of the Navy, enclosing a statement of moneys transferred from certain specific appropriations to other objects of expenditure, &c.

Both the above documents were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The engrossed bill for the relief of Jonathan B. Eastman, and the engrossed bill for the relief of Jabez Hull, were read a third time and passed.

The bill for the relief of Thomas and John Clifford, and others, of Philadelphia, was taken up in Committee of the Whole. This case, as stated by Mr. NEWTON, is one in which the Messrs. Clifford have paid a certain sum in duties on articles which the Supreme Court has since decided were not dutiable under the existing laws. This bill is to enable them to withdraw from the Treasury the moneys thus erroneously paid. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

CONGRESSIONAL RESERVATION.

On motion of Mr. REYNOLDS, the House proceeded to the consideration of the following resolve, submitted by him a few days ago:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of appropriating all that tract of land known by the name of the "Congressional Reservation," lying in the counties of Maury and Giles, in the State of Tennessee, for the extinguishment of the Gerieme land warrants issued by the State of North Carolina, and that the actual occupants within the bounds of said tract, who have been living on said land on the first day of January last past shall have a preference to perfect titles thereto: Provided, No one shall be permitted to appropriate more than six hundred and forty acres, nor less than fifty acres, of land.

This motion Mr. YANCEY proposed to amend, by striking out the whole, except the word "Resolved," and inserting the following, in lieu thereof:

"That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of appropriating so much of the land lying in the State of Tennessee, known by the name of the 'Congressional Reservation,' as may be sufficient to extinguish the claims under land warrants issued by the State of North Carolina, agreeably to the third section of an act of Congress of the 18th of April, 1806, entitled 'An act to authorize the State of Tennessee to issue grants and perfect titles to certain lands therein described, and to settle claims to the vacant and unappropriated land within the same.'"

Mr. YANCEY supported his motion, by showing how the interest of North Carolina would be injuriously affected by the passage of the resolution in its present shape.

Mr. REYNOLDS said he had no objection to the amendment, except his anxiety that those persons who had settled on these lands seven or eight years, and to this day been undisturbed by the Government, should have the preference in purchasing. He had their case much at heart. If ever there were people in the Union entitled to the right of pre-emption, it was those people. They formed the barrier of that country. They were a part of the brave men that defeated the Creek Indians; and even partook in the glory of the defence of Louisiana, when their country required their services. Such men deserved attention from Government. But being also anxious for the other object of his motion, and there appearing to be an objection to connecting them, he should consent to the amendment now proposed.

Mr. GASTON took a view of the successive laws of North Carolina, Tennessee, and the United States, on the subject of these land claims. The State of North Carolina, in parting with her rights to the United States, in 1803 or 1804, had done it on certain conditions; one of which was, that, in obtaining titles, no preference should be given to the citizens of Tennessee over those of any other State. It was therefore immaterial, he said, what were the particular merits of the individuals to whom the gentleman from Tennessee desired to secure the right of pre-emption. If the hands of Congress were tied up by the terms of the act of cession of North Carolina, the merits of these settlers on the lands would not avail to establish their claim to pre-emption rights.

Mr. ROBERTSON thought the discussion of the claims of actual settlers to rights of pre-emption to be at this time premature, as not properly before the House. He saw no objection to the resolution now proposed to be amended.

Mr. PICKENS spoke in favor of the amendment. The State of North Carolina had made a grant of her rights in an act containing certain conditions, and requiring the assent of Congress as a preliminary. The assent contained in the act of Congress in 1806, in the opinion of North Carolina, was not sufficient to satisfy her previous act; and, in consequence of this insufficiency, she had repealed her first act. The question, whether this repeal was valid would depend on the question whether the act of Congress of 1806 contained the reservations in favor of North Carolina, which she required as the conditions of the surrender of her rights. The last clause of the original resolution, which the gentleman from Tennessee had so much at heart, embraced a principle on which, in his opinion, the Congress had no right to act, North Carolina having expressly stipulated against it.

The amendment proposed by Mr. YANCEY was agreed to; and, thus agreed to, the resolution was passed.

ROADS AND CANALS.

Mr. DARLINGTON offered for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee appointed on so much of the President's Message as relates to Roads and Canals be instructed to inquire into the expediency of extending prompt and efficient aid, on the part of the General Government, to the company incorporated for the purpose of cutting a canal from the waters of the Chesapeake to those of the Delaware, commonly called the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal.

Mr. DARLINGTON said, he flattered himself that the House would not only agree to the resolution, but act effectually on the subject of it. It was fashionable, he added, to call ourselves an enlightened people. He was not disposed to controvert this principle, but he hoped we should, by our acts, substantiate our claim to this character. The members of the Government had, he believed, been made sensible, by the course and events of the war, of the importance of inland communication, and he hoped they would, during peace, profit by their experience, and give it all the aid in their power.

The motion of Mr. D. was agreed to.

FRIDAY, December 22.

Mr. CONDUCT presented a petition from the Manufacturing Association of New Jersey, praying that the importation of cotton fabrics of a coarse texture may be absolutely or virtually prohibited.—Referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. ARCHER presented sundry documents in relation to the election and return of George Baer as one of the members of this House for the State of Maryland, which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, presented a petition of Erastus Root, praying that the seat of JOHN ADAMS, whom he alleges has been unduly returned as one of the members of this House for the State of New York, may be vacated; and that he may be admitted to a seat in the House in the place of the said JOHN ADAMS.—Referred to the Committee of Elections.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, transmitting a letter from the Register of the Land Office and Receiver of Public Moneys at Kaskaskia, accompanied with a list of persons who have had less than four hundred acres confirmed to them, and a statement of claims for donations as heads of families, improvement rights, and militia rights, which were referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. YANCEY offered for consideration the following resolution. It appeared to him, he said, that such a measure as it embraced, if adopted, would be productive of much good to the nation and to the House, and could not involve any violation of the rights of individuals:

Resolved, That the committee to whom has been referred the revision and amendment of the rules and orders of the House, be instructed to inquire into the expediency of adopting a rule to the following effect: That after a claim has been heard upon its merits, and rejected by the House, it shall not be referred to a committee, unless the member presenting it shall state that it is supported by additional testimony, which in his opinion would produce a different decision of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Tennessee, submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing to those persons claiming public lands in the Mississippi Territory under an act of the Legislature of Georgia, passed January 7, 1795, who have failed to compromise and make a settlement of their claims in conformity with the provisions of an act of Congress, entitled, an act for the indemnification of certain claimants of public lands in the Mississippi Territory, within the time therein limited, a further time to obtain the benefit of said mentioned act.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on Public Lands, made an unfavorable report on the petition of John W. Winn; which was read and concurred in.

Mr. ROBERTSON, also, from the same committee, made a favorable report on the petition of C. Markle, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was twice read and committed.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the same committee, made the following report:

The Committee on the Public Lands, who were instructed by a resolution of the House to inquire into the expediency of granting rights of occupancy and pre-emption at two dollars per acre to all such persons as shall be actually seated, on the 1st day of October 1816, upon any section of land obtained by treaty or conquest from the Creek nation of Indians during the late war:

States have been in constant operation; that intrusions on Indian lands have been equally forbidden; that the policy and wisdom of such laws appear to be undeniable. If those by whom they have been violated have in some instances been vested with the rights of pre-emption, yet it seems clearly impolitic to hold out invitations to a further disregard of them. The committee are not aware that the system in this respect requires alteration or amendment. They therefore respectfully submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to grant rights of occupancy or pre-emption to such persons as shall settle on the public lands which have been obtained by treaty or conquest from the Creek Indians during the late war.

This report being under consideration—

Mr. THOMAS opposed the report with much zeal, as well on the ground of the expediency of establishing an uniformity in the price of the public lands, as on that of the propriety of favoring those whose enterprise and spirit first should penetrate the wilderness by useful settlements. These points he illustrated by various arguments, and particularly dwelt on the importance of an early settlement of that frontier country, &c.

Mr. ROBERTSON replied in defence of the report, on the ground of the impolicy and absurdity of adopting measures that should encourage the violation of the existing laws which prohibit unlicensed settlements on the public lands. The question of changing the mode of disposing of the public lands, he said, was yet before the committee, and not, therefore, properly before the House, though it soon would be. Mr. R. made some remarks going to prove the anxiety of the Government to throw this land into market, &c. (with a view to its early settlement,) as evinced by the progress already made in preparing it for that purpose, in preference to other lands that had been much longer in possession of the United States, &c.

WESTERN ROADS.

Mr. EASTON, after a number of remarks going to show the importance of the object he had in view and the difficulty, if not impossibility, of its being executed in any other way than under the authority of the Government, moved the following instruction to the Committee on Roads and Canals:

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be instructed to inquire into the expediency of opening roads, to wit: from Shawneetown to Kaskaskias, in Illinois; from the town of Hamilton in Ohio to Vincennes in Indiana, thence to the town of St. Louis in Missouri, thence by the way of Arkansas to the northern boundary line of the State of Louisiana.

The motion was agreed to.

[The following is the plan proposed by Mr. EASTON, in his observations for opening and improving roads: The President of the United States to be authorized to appoint a suitable number of commissioners to survey, mark, and lay out the said roads, and to designate the places where it will be necessary and proper that persons should settle, for the purpose of keeping houses of entertainment for accommodation of travellers; that the Governors or Secretaries of the respective Territories be authorized to lease to an inhabitant who will settle at those places, a tract of land not exceeding six hundred and forty acres, nor less than three hundred and thirty acres, on condition of their opening and keeping in repair the road for the distance allotted to them for the term of ten years, which allotments shall be next adjoining the lands so leased to them respectively; and at the expiration of the leases, the lessees, their heirs or assigns, upon satisfying the President of the United States for the time being, that they have fulfilled the conditions of the leases respectively, shall be entitled to receive a patent for the lands so leased from the Government: Provided, That no one lessee shall be required to keep the road in repair for more than five miles for a tract of three hundred and twenty acres, nor more than ten miles for a tract of six hundred and forty acres; and the commissioners in laying out and marking said roads, shall report to the Governors or Secretaries the several allotments specially, specifying in what allotments the lessees ought to be entitled to six hundred and forty acres, and in what allotments they will be entitled to a less quantity of land, and to what amount; which said allotments shall respectively be numbered, and laid down upon a plat of the said roads, to be platted by the surveyors to be employed to run the same; one copy whereof shall be deposited with the Governor of the Territory in which the road shall be, and other copies of the plats of said roads to be deposited in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office.]

PRIVATE LOSSES IN SERVICE, &c.

On motion of Mr. YANCEY, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill authorizing the payment for private property lost, captured, or destroyed, whilst in the service of the United States, during the late war.

Various amendments of a verbal nature were made to the bill, on which considerable discussion took place.

The most earnest discussion took place on motions successively made by Messrs. DESHA, THOMAS, WILDE, and CLAY, to amend the bill so as to include the case of the horses belonging to those militia who captured Proctor's army, that were lost in consequence of their riders being separated from, and crossing the lake without their horses, which were left in the care of the United States' officers.

These motions were advocated by the above gentlemen, and others, and opposed by Mr. YANCEY and others. The main objection of them was, that the daily allowance (by the act of 1795) to mounted volunteers and militia, for the use of their horses, was intended to cover all risks, except those incident to battle; and that the accidents of breaking loose, getting mired, &c., by which the horses in question were lost, were such as were intended to be covered by the liberal allowance of forty cents per day for the use and risk of horses. On the other hand, it was contended, with force, that the United States, having separated the rider from his horse, and assumed the care of it, was liable for accidents which occurred, generally, in consequence of the absence of the care and attention bestowed on the animal by his proprietor.

No one of the amendments on this subject prevailed, all of them being negatived, by 20 or 30 majority.

The following are Mr. DESHA's remarks on the above bill:

Mr. DESHA said, his object in rising was to move that so much of the amendment, proposed by the chairman of the Committee of Claims, to the bill under consideration, as relates to a deduction of forty cents per day, allowed by the act of 1795, for the use and risk of horses, should be struck out. He flattered himself, that before he sat down, he should be able to convince the honorable gentleman, that the bill with his amendment, unless the part that relates to the deduction of forty cents per day should be erased, was partial in its provisions, and manifestly unjust, particularly as related to Governor Shelby's volunteers, who were separated from their horses on Lake Erie, in the Fall of 1813. The bill, as it now stands, makes provision for paying for horses lost, in consequence of the failure, on the part of Government, to furnish a sufficiency of forage, without any deduction—neither ought there to be any. This is just; but how does it stand in relation to horses lost in consequence of the owners being separated from them by order of the commanding General, as was the case with Governor Shelby's men, who, under the order of the commanding officer, left their horses on the peninsula, between Sandusky and Portage river, crossed the lake where it was forty miles wide, principally in open boats, pursued the enemy upwards of a hundred miles into the interior of Canada, overtook them, and with the aid of a regiment of volunteers, commanded by my worthy colleague, captured Proctor's army, and defeated, with considerable slaughter, hosts of the savage allies of Britain. And can it be said that these men did not render as important services as those who lost their horses for want of forage. Then why this deduction of forty cents per day, from the commencement of the service? It is partiality in the extreme. I have no hesitation in saying, that Government is bound, in justice, to pay for all horses lost at Portage, by accident or otherwise. The horses, for upwards of four weeks, were virtually and indeed actually in possession of the Government, by order of its agent, during which time the owners had no control over them; men were left to take care of them, and to prevent them from breaking over the fence made across the peninsula. Then I say, in law, equity and justice, that all losses sustained during this time, the Government is bound to pay for; and to refuse, I have no hesitation in saying, is manifest injustice.

What was the situation on your borders at the time the volunteers tendered their services? Hull had surrendered up an army. Winchester had been defeated at the river Raisin. Dudley's regiment was cut up at the Rapids. The blood of the frontier inhabitants was flowing under the tomahawk and scalping knife. Dismay hovered on your borders. Such was the situation when the aged and patriotic Shelby, Governor of Kentucky, beat up for volunteers. After it was known that he would head them in person and lead them against the enemy, a short notice produced at the place of rendezvous, thirty-five or six hundred volunteers prepared to follow their patriotic leader into Canada, or anywhere else where they might be serviceable to their country. Pay was scarcely a consideration with them; yet they could not believe that their country would be ungrateful. The understanding was, that if their horses were lost, Government would pay for them. The quartermaster general, by the order, and under the eye of the Governor, had the horses valued by disinterested persons, and entered in a book for that purpose, copies of which, I believe, are deposited in the War Department. Under these circumstances, had not the volunteers a right to expect remuneration in case of losses, where such losses were not occasioned through any neglect on their part—and will Government act ungratefully towards her patriotic sons of the West, who, with other exertions, captured a whole army, with the aid of my colleague's regiment, and wrested, as it were, the tomahawk and scalping knife from the hands of hordes of savages, by giving peace to the frontiers, by deducting forty cents per day from the hard-earned wages of men who rendered important services, and in doing which they had the misfortune to lose their horses? Will we by this act verify what has been so often said by the enemies of free Governments, that Republics are always ungrateful?

Mr. DESHA had no hesitation in believing, that, if every horse belonging to Governor Shelby's volunteers had been lost—and the number lost was inconsiderable—and had to be paid for by Government—it was still a saving business to them; particularly when the expense of transportation of baggage is taken into consideration, together with the importance of the service rendered, as well as the immense amount of property taken from the enemy on the Thames. The men convened at the place of rendezvous at a short notice. It would have taken considerable time to have procured wagons and teams for the transportation of the baggage. It would have taken weeks in marching the men on foot upwards of three hundred miles to the lake, and much difficulty and time to have gotten the baggage wagons there, through a country that abounds in swamps and marshes. Before the army could have arrived, under all these difficulties, the windy season, which commences periodically on the Lakes, must have set in, which would have rendered it impossible for the army to have crossed over in the kind of craft they had to cross in. The failure of the expedition would have been the inevitable consequence, and the expense would have been nearly equal to what it is now, when success attended our arms. The desperate devastations and massacres of the savage enemy would have continued another season on our borders. The Government would have had to have sent more men, and been subjected to the expense of another campaign, the success of which, independent of the expense, would have been more doubtful, as the enemy would have gotten over the panic, and been in all probability better prepared for your reception. Add to this the amount of property taken from the enemy, supposed to be considerable—upwards of a million of dollars in value—in munitions of war; ordnance, military stores, and other property.

Mr. D. said, when all these things were considered, together with the almost incalculable difficulties, toils, hardships, and starvations, that had to be encountered and surmounted on the expedition, Government ought not to hesitate in doing justice, if they were not disposed to remunerate liberally. But, what astonished him more than anything else, was the extraordinary opposition of the chairman of the Committee of Claims, who reported this bill, to granting pay for lost horses, and the want of his usual liberality in construing the act of 1795, which allows forty cents a day for the use and risk of horses. In this instance, the honorable gentleman appears not to have taken the use of horses into consideration, or certainly he would not be so anxious for the deduction, as contemplated in his amendment, from the commencement of the service. It is certainly a laudable principle, that of holding fast the public purse-strings; but this ought not to be the first consideration with a politician: justice ought to be deemed paramount to every other consideration. The honorable gentleman does not feel as I do on this occasion; and I have no doubt but he has a full share of philanthropy in his composition. It must be ascribed to the circumstance of the gentleman having been sitting at home at his ease; heard the account of our success, and no doubt was highly pleased with it; and probably heard of some of the difficulties we had to encounter; but it slipped by like the passing wind, and left no lasting impression. If the gentleman had been present, and witnessed the toils and difficulties that had been encountered, he perhaps would feel the same sympathies that I feel, and would think with me, that the part of his amendment that relates to a reduction of forty cents per day ought to be stricken out; and that justice demands, and sound policy dictates, that Government should pay for the horses lost, without any deduction of pay.

The bill was reported to the House with several amendments, and ordered to lie on the table.

TUESDAY, December 26.

Another member to wit: from Connecticut, BENJAMIN TALLMADGE, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. BRADBURY, presented a petition of sundry merchants in the District of Maine, praying for the establishment of a National Bank; and Mr.

HOPKINSON presented similar petitions from sundry inhabitants of the city of Philadelphia.—Referred to the Committee on an Uniform National Currency.

Mr. MASON presented a petition of a committee appointed by, and acting for and in behalf of the cotton manufacturers residing in Providence and its vicinity, in the State of Rhode Island, praying that the importation of all cotton goods, (nankeens excepted,) the production of places beyond the Cape of Good Hope, may be prohibited; and that such additional duties may be laid on cotton goods of a coarse texture, imported from other countries, as will give to the petitioners the necessary protection and encouragement.

Mr. HOPKINSON presented a petition of a committee of the manufacturers of cotton and woollen goods in the city of Philadelphia and its vicinity, praying that additional duties may be imposed on the importation of woollen manufactures, and that a duty of twenty-five per centum ad valorem may be imposed on the importation of cotton goods from foreign countries.—Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting copies of a proclamation notifying the Convention concluded with Great Britain on the 3d day of July last, recommending to Congress such legislative provisions as the Convention may call for on the part of the United States.—Referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

An engrossed bill entitled "An act for the relief of Thomas and John Clifford, Elisha Fisher and Company, Thomas Clifford, and Thomas Clifford and Son," was read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. ROSS,

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to communicate to the House, if anything, and what, has been done in pursuance of the act of Congress, of the 18th of April, 1814, entitled "An act authorizing a subscription to the laws of the United States, and for the distribution thereof," and if anything has occurred to delay or prevent the preparation, execution, or distribution of the work, to whom, or to what cause, it is attributable.

MILITARY ACADEMIES.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill "making provision for three additional Military Academies."

[This bill proposes that there shall be established three additional Military Academies; one within the District of Columbia; one at Mount Dearborn, in South Carolina; and one in the vicinity of Newport, at the junction of the Ohio and Licking rivers, in the State of Kentucky, with the same establishment of officers, and under the same regulations generally as the present Military Academy; the number of cadets in the several Military Academies never to exceed in the whole, the number of eight hundred.]

The bill was twice read and committed.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. TAYLOR of New York, from the Committee of Elections, made a report on the petition of Erastus Root, contesting the election of John Adams, a member returned to serve in this House.

The report states, that Mr. Adams was returned in consequence of the error committed by the deputy clerk of Green county, (one of the two composing that Congressional district,) who, in copying the polls, spelt the name Root instead of Root, whereby 576 of his votes were vitiated, which left a majority to Mr. Adams, who was therefore returned. The committee report that Mr. Root had in fact the majority of votes, as appeared by evidence before them, and was admitted by Mr. Adams. The committee recommend the adoption of the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That John Adams is not entitled to a seat in this House.

"Resolved, That Erastus Root is entitled to a seat in this House."

The report was further explained by Mr. TAYLOR, and no objection having been made to it on any part, it was agreed to, nem. con.

Mr. Root appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

WEDNESDAY, December 27.

Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, presented a petition of the York Cotton Factory Company, in the State of Massachusetts, praying that such protection and encouragement may be extended to the manufacturing establishments within the United States, as may, in the wisdom of Congress, seem meet and proper.—Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. ROSS presented petitions of sundry inhabitants of the county of Lehigh, in the State of Pennsylvania, praying that the several acts imposing duties on distilleries, on domestic manufactures, and on retailers, may be repealed, and that the direct tax may be augmented.

Mr. PLEASANTS from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a resolution requesting the President of the United States to present medals to Captain James Biddle, and the officers of the sloop-of-war Hornet; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Friday next.

Mr. PLEASANTS also reported a bill rewarding the officers and crew of the sloop-of-war Hornet, for the capture and destruction of the British sloop-of-war Penguin; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Friday next.

Mr. THOMAS, after stating that a distinction not intended by the Government, now existed in the laws between soldiers of the usual military age, and those enlisted above and below it, under a law passed at a late period in the war, moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting donations of an hundred and sixty acres of land to all persons under the age of eighteen, and over that of forty-five years, enlisted as regular soldiers in the Army of the United States to serve for five years, or during the late war, and who have or shall receive an honorable discharge.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. THOMAS,

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs, be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the equitable liquidation of all claims against the Quartermaster's department, for rations and forage furnished to any of the troops of the United States, either volunteers, militia, or regulars, by a citizen whose accounts or vouchers are informal.

PRIVATE LOSSES IN SERVICE, &c.

The House resumed the consideration of the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole to the bill making compensation for property lost, captured, or destroyed while in the military service of the United States; and the said amendments being again read, were concurred in by the House.

A motion was then made, by Mr. YANCEY, further to amend the said bill by inserting the following section:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That any person, whether of cavalry, mounted militia, or volunteers, who, in the late war aforesaid, has sustained damage by the loss of a horse, in consequence of the owner being dismounted, or separated and detached from the same, by order of the commanding officer, or in consequence of the rider being killed or wounded in battle, shall be allowed and paid the value of such horse, at the time he was received into the public service; deducting therefrom the amount which has been paid, or may be claimed, for the use and risk of the same, while in the service aforesaid.

Mr. DESHA moved to strike out the latter clause of this proposed amendment, which he considered unjust as well as ungenerous.

Mr. JOHNSON said, the character of the men, immediately interested in this subject, had the strongest claim upon the justice of Congress. The farmers and mechanics, and men who, generally speaking, gained a livelihood by labor; men who had lived in domestic ease, quiet, and happiness, until called upon to defend the soil and the rights of their country; men in moderate circumstances, and many of them really poor, flocked to your standard—virtuous, valiant, and patriotic. They never aimed at power, and authority, and distinction, save that which has arisen from the glory they have acquired from their valiant deeds, and having by their toils and sufferings elevated the character of the nation to the highest pinnacle, are satisfied to retire to private life to enjoy, under the shade of the vine and the fig tree, rights and privileges which they have, with others, defended. These are the men who must be affected by the decision of this question; these are the men who ask for justice, not charity, although they believe, that, upon this principle, an appeal would not be vain. This bill makes unjust distinctions. Cases of hardships are omitted. Horses lost in battle, from unavoidable casualty, should be classed with horses killed in battle. No reason can be given why the distinction should be made. It is a distinction without difference. Justice discards any such rule. Why pay for horses killed in battle?—because the risk is no ordinary one, but extraordinary. The same reason will embrace horses lost in battle. In each case Congress is bound in justice and good policy to remunerate the sufferers.

Again, the bill provides for the payment of horses lost for want of forage; this is a very important provision, founded in justice, arising from an implied obligation on the part of the United States to pay damages resulting from a failure on the part of the Government to furnish forage, which was one condition upon which the mounted volunteer undertook to serve his country; and if it was impracticable to comply with this positive stipulation, and that is admitted, the misfortune should not rest upon the citizen soldiers, but on Government. But, Mr. J. said, a case as strong as either of the others, presented itself for consideration, the payment for horses lost where the rider was dismounted by order of the commanding General. Take the memorable case of Governor Shelby and his gallant corps. Here again the principles of policy and justice plead for remuneration; the reason is obvious, an act of Government produced the result. The horses were in this case lost by an order of the commanding General, without any fault or negligence in the mounted volunteer. Can there be a stronger case? It may be strengthened, it may be placed, not only on the order of the commander, but on the intrinsic merit of that order. What causes produced this order? The impossibility of riding over the waters of Lake Erie, and the necessity of pursuing the enemy. If the President and his Cabinet had been there, would the order have been sanctioned? If Congress had been there, would Congress have sanctioned the order? These inquiries need no answer. Then, upon what principle can these claims be rejected, and all similar claims? for the argument will apply to all other cases. But the case may yet be strengthened. In the result of the measure—in the destruction of the enemy in that quarter—compare the labors of these men with the paltry sum which will be expended in paying for a few lost horses. A provision has been reported to give these men pay for their horses, after deducting forty cents per day, which the law gave them. The proposition contains a most manifest injustice. The value of the horse, and the ordinary risk of the horse, were worth forty cents per day; and, notwithstanding, it is proposed to take away that which Government contracted to give the mounted volunteer. Did the Government have to use coercion? No, thousands flocked to the standard of their country in the hour of peril, not doubting in times of peace they should meet with at least justice if not liberality. Such was the confidence of the American people. It is to be hoped that this confidence was well founded; that this just expectation will be realized. But, Mr. J. said, members seemed to want correct information as to the services and value of the horse of a mounted volunteer. It dispensed with all the expensive train of baggage wagons and provision escorts. It saved thousands to the United States, at the moment that it enabled the commanding officer to protect invaded frontiers, to pursue the enemy, and force him to battle or surrender.

In many parts no other force would have done; the forces never disappointed expectation, and Congress should not hesitate on this occasion to be just if not liberal.

The feelings of gratitude and justice should be towards those people; they demand no indemnity for the common calamities of war; by the wanton destruction of private property by the enemy, the sacking of towns, burning of houses;—no such claims are set up; the Government had no agency in these injuries. These barbarities were not produced by any official act of the Government. The nation cannot forget the sorrows of these men, and the nation will demand good cause for a refusal on our part to pay them. A few days ago the merit of these men was presented strongly to the affections of this nation. Their services will not be forgotten; their sufferings were great and their separation from their horses produced much hardship, and was the cause of the loss of their property, and Government cannot refuse remuneration.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia, spoke at length, as well as Mr. DESHA, in favor of the first part of the proposed new section, and against the proviso.

The motion of Mr. DESHA was opposed by Mr. YANCEY, who said, if it were adopted, he should be compelled to vote against his own amendment.

The question on Mr. DESHA's motion was decided by yeas and nays, as follows: For his amendment 54, against it 83, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adgate, Baer, Baker, Barbour, Bassett, Birdseye, Brooks, Burnside, Caldwell, Chappell, Clarke of North Carolina, Clendennin, Clifton, Comstock, Creighton, Darlington, Desha, Forney, Griffin, Hahn, Heister, Henderson, Hungerford, Irwin of Pennsylvania, Jackson, Johnson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Kerr of Virginia, Love, McCoy, McKee, McLean of Kentucky, McLean of Ohio, Moore of South Carolina, Newton, Parris, Powell, Reynolds, Roane, Robertson, Ross, Schenck, Smith of Virginia, Southard, Taul, Taylor of South Carolina, Thomas, Townsend, Wallace, Ward of New Jersey, Wendover, Whiteside, Willoughby, and Thomas Wilson.

NAYS—Messrs. Alexander, Archer, Atherton, Baylies, Betts, Birdsall, Boss, Bradbury, Breckenridge, Brigham, Brown, Burwell, Cady, Calhoun, Champion, Chipman, Clayton, Condict, Cooper, Crawford, Cuthbert, Davenport, Forsyth, Gaston, Gholson, Gold, Grosvenor, Hall, Hammond, Hawes, Herbert, Hopkinson, Hulbert, Ingham, Jewett, Kent, King of Massachusetts, King of North Carolina, Langdon, Law, Lovett, Lowndes, Lumpkin, Lyle, Lyon, Maclay, Marsh, Mason, Mayrant, Mills, Milnor, Moffit, Nelson of Massachusetts, Noyes, Pickens, Piper, Pleasants, Reed, Rice, Root, Ruggles, Sergeant, Savage, Sheffield, Smith of Pennsylvania, Stanford, Strong, Stuart, Sturges, Taggart, Tallmadge, Tate, Telfair, Vose, Wheaton, Wilcox, Wilde, Wilkin, Williams, William Wilson, Woodward, Yancey, and Yates.

So the motion to amend Mr. YANCEY's proposed amendment was rejected.

Mr. DESHA then moved an amendment, limiting the proposed deduction of pay to the time following the loss of the horse, so as to leave the mounted volunteer the benefit of the allowance for the time he was in service previous to the death of his horse.

After some warm debate on this motion, between Mr. DESHA and Mr. YANCEY, it also was negatived.

The amendment of Mr. YANCEY, as originally proposed, was then agreed to without a division.

Mr. SOUTHARD proposed a new section to the bill, by way of limitation to its provisions; which he withdrew to make way for one offered by Mr. ATHERTON, for barring all claims not preferred at the Treasury within a limited time. The motion was negatived, after debate.

On motion by Mr. GROSVENOR, an amendment was adopted including boats in the section providing for the payment for pressed horses, carts, &c.

Mr. MAYRANT made a motion to amend the same section so as to include "all other property," lost in the public service. He particularly called the attention of the House to the case of slaves, used as drivers of wagons, as sailors, laborers, &c., employed or pressed into the service of the United States, and lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy.

This motion was opposed by Mr. YANCEY, and supported by Mr. ROBERTSON. It was negatived by a considerable majority.

Other amendments were proposed, some of which were agreed to, and others rejected. Among the latter was one proposed by Mr. ATHERTON, founded on the principle that a distinction ought to be made between property employed by contract with individuals and property impressed, inasmuch as the individual making a contract is supposed to do it with full information of the risks to which it is liable, and to stipulate accordingly for increased compensation.

Mr. McLEAN, of Ohio, moved an amendment, intended to cover the case of property involved in Hull's surrender at Detroit; which was negatived. For the amendment 61, against it 67.

The bill was at length ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

THURSDAY, December 28.

Mr. JENNINGS presented the petition of the Legislature of the Territory of Indiana, praying that certain manufacturers of domestic goods, in said Territory, may not be subjected to the penalties provided for violations of the laws imposing duties on domestic manufactures, because of their ignorance of, or inability to comply with the requisitions of said laws.—Referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. MOFFIT presented a petition of the manufacturers of cotton goods, in the county of Rensselaer, and State of New York, praying that the importation of cotton goods from places beyond the Cape of Good Hope may be prohibited, and that the duties on cotton goods, imported from other places, may be increased.—Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. JENNINGS presented the petition of the Legislature of the Territory of Indiana, praying that the said Territory may be erected into a State government, and that the same be admitted into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States.—Referred to Messrs. JENNINGS, McKEE, HENDERSON, REED, and MOFFIT.

On motion of Mr. SAVAGE, the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures were instructed to inquire into the expediency of erecting a new collection district from the districts of Vermont and Champlain, to be denominated the district of Whitehall, and to include all such shores and waters of Lakes Champlain and George, and the rivers connected therewith, as lie south of Basin Harbor, in the State of Vermont.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, the Committee on the Public Lands were instructed to inquire into the expediency of extending the time for issuing military land warrants for services during the Revolutionary war, and locating the same on any unlocated parts of the fifty quarter townships, and the fractional quarter townships reserved by law for original holders of military land warrants.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting the annual statement of the amount of duties and drawbacks on goods, wares, and merchandise imported into and exported from the United States, during the years 1812, 1813, and 1814.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill to enlarge the time for ascertaining the annual transfers, within the several collection districts in the United States, of property subject to the direct tax, and for other purposes; which was twice read, and committed.

PORTS OF ENTRY.

Mr. McLEAN, of Ohio, offered for consideration the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing by law a port of entry at Cincinnati, in the State of Ohio."

Mr. McLEAN introduced the above resolution by observing, that a very respectable and wealthy association of gentlemen had been formed in Cincinnati for the purpose of importing goods from Europe to that place; that the agent of the company, before this time, had arrived in England where he calculated on fixing his residence. He had also been informed, that another similar association was forming at the same place. The invaluable discovery of propelling boats by the agency of steam, would enable these enterprising associations to surmount with ease every difficulty in ascending the Mississippi and Ohio rivers. He believed it would not require more than twenty-nine or thirty days to perform the voyage from Orleans to Cincinnati; it would neither be expensive nor hazardous. At present, Mr. M. observed, the city of New Orleans is the nearest port of delivery to Cincinnati. Of course, importers at the latter place would have to bond their duties at Orleans, and the time consumed in proceeding to Cincinnati would be lost, on the general credit given for the payment of duties. This inconvenience could only be remedied by the adoption of the measure proposed in the resolution. He had no doubt but that it would be in the power of the committee to adopt such provisions as would effectually guard the revenue from fraud, which some may anticipate from so long an inland navigation.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, the proposed resolution was amended by adding to the end of it the words, "Louisville, in the State of Kentucky;" and thus amended, was agreed to.

PRIVATE LOSSES IN SERVICE, &c.

The engrossed bill to authorize payment for property lost, captured, and destroyed by the enemy, whilst in the service of the United States, during the late war, was read the third time.

On this question, Mr. FORSYTH required the yeas and nays, being opposed to the passage of the bill, because, as he conceived, in it cases were identified which had no points of similarity; and, in general, the provisions of the bill were inconsistent with each other, and in some instances with the common principles of justice.

The bill was passed—yeas 113, nays 15, as follows:

INVALID CORPS.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, the House re-solved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill making provision for the support of the infirm, disabled, and superannuated officers of the army of the Revolution, of the late war, and of the army for the time being.

Besides one or two small amendments to the detail of the bill, the following proceedings took place on it:

Mr. LOWNDES rose for the purpose of obtaining information whether the individuals to come in under this bill were to be considered on the foot-ing of charity merely, or of actual service. There was nothing, he remarked, in the bill, fixing the decree of corporeal disability which should pre-vent an invalid from entering this corps. Under present impressions, he said, it appeared to him that the proposed invalid corps was too much an imitation of European institutions, but little adapted to the state of society which happily exists in our country. Mr. L. said he certainly should not object to any provision which charity or a just liberality to those who have suffered in the service of their country might present for consideration. He was not only willing, but anxious, to provide in any manner deemed best for those who are disabled by the injuries re-ceived in service from providing for themselves. But he wished to hear the reasons why Congress should depart from the old method, and, as he thought, the best method, of providing for such persons (by pensions) the means of support at their own homes, in order to collect them in a body as was now proposed, though disabled from performing active duty. Such a system might suit countries, the Governments of which dare not trust the people with arms in their hands; those countries which required the continual presence of military power, and where there were always some duties for men in military array to perform, which invalids could execute as well as others. But here, where no such necessity ex-isted, he thought it would be more charitable and profitable, in every point of view, to pursue a different course, and adhere to the old system of affording to disabled soldiers the means of sup-port by moderate pensions.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, pointed out the features of the bill which described the duties and character to be attached to this corps. The per-sons composing it were not to be entitled to pro-motion, and were to be employed in garrison duty, or such stationary service as the President should direct, to which they would be nearly as competent as able-bodied men. It was not pro-posed to substitute this bill for the invalid pension system. The two systems might well exist to-gether. Those who did not choose to enter this corps would, as at present, be entitled to pensions, which must be relinquished by those who enter into this service. The disabled soldier will have the option of the one or the other. As to the comparison between the proposed establishments and the institutions of Europe, Mr. J. said the supposed similarity did not exist, because the power of the Sovereign there depends on his troops, differing widely from our situation. In the old countries they have hospitals of invalids, who perform no duty whatever. The corps pro-posed by this bill was of a mixed character. Whilst they were supported by their country in comfort, they would require its generosity by corresponding services. The support they receive will merely be a compensation for services rendered. The bill, therefore, is more of a military than charitable character, and is not meant as a substitute for the pension system.

Mr. WILDE moved an amendment to the bill, the object of which was to afford the benefit of its provisions to such of the militia of the United States as have actually served in war, and who have incurred disability by wounds or diseases contracted during their term of service. This motion he supported by arguments drawn from the merits of the militia thus disabled, and the injustice of making a discrimination in favor of regulars.

This amendment was agreed to.

The Committee of the Whole rose and reported the bill to the House. No opposition was made to any of the amendments to the bill, except the one last mentioned, which was opposed by Mr. HUGER, who drew a distinction between the regulars and militia, whom, he said, he had rather see provided for in any other way. The amendment was defended by Mr. WILDE and Mr. JOHNSON, and was agreed to.

On the question whether the bill should pass to a third reading,

Mr. CONNER said he felt it his duty to rise on this occasion. He coincided with the sentiments of the gentleman from South Carolina, that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Georgia was an improper amendment; that its effect was to mix corps which should be kept distinct, or destroy that esprit du corps which should ever prevail in an army. However, as the evil effects of the amendment in operation might not be very great, he would vote for the bill in its present shape rather than it should not pass. Mr. C. said, he believed the passage of that bill depended on whether motives of humanity, policy, and justice, should prevail over those of a merely pecuniary nature, and he trusted that that point would not for a moment remain doubtful in this honorable body. It was humane, and coincident with the dictates of the wisest policy, that hospitals be erected in the vicinity of the operations of armies, for the reception of the wounded. Certainly the same humanity and wisdom dictated that corps of invalids or hospitals for invalids be organized for the protection of those brave men who had been crippled in their country's service, and who have thus been disabled from application, or procuring the means of support. In his opinion the Government would be equally censurable for the neglect of the one as a General would be for the wanton abandonment of the other. This bill, while it provided for that object, would have the further highly beneficial effect of rendering disposable, for active operations in the field, a force of nearly the amount contemplated by the bill, which would otherwise be employed in garrison duty. A variety of considerations might be urged which would go to demonstrate that this subject is intimately connected with the interests of the Army, with creating a martial spirit, and affording inducements and means of a rapid augmentation of our Military Establishment in times of danger and emergency. The Duke of Sully had recorded, as one of the finest strokes of policy, and as one of the greatest evidences of the masterly mind and benevolent heart of Henry IV, his establishment of a hospital for invalids. But Mr. C. forbore from urging such considerations, because he apprehended that arguments which had for their object the interest, or tended to demonstrate the efficiency of regular armies, would have but little weight with the honorable body of which he was a member. Last Winter, indeed, when danger was imminent, when the Constitution was tottering on its base, when the great central power which holds together these federative bodies was so far weakened, that there was danger and expectation of some of them being hurled from their respective orbits, it was considered that the national arm should be invigorated; that militia was inefficient but for the purpose of internal defence; that we should have system and organization; that in peace we should be prepared for war. Such, said Mr. C., were popular sentiments in that honorable body when the storm was at its height. But suddenly it was hushed; there was a calm; all apprehension of danger or disquiet had vanished; there were to be no more "wars or rumors of wars;" eternal sunshine was seen to gleam through the vista of futurity. He confessed that he was not a convert to the faith of this political millenium. He saw it not in our extended domain, which embraced every clime, nor in our rich commerce, which covered every sea, and excited the jealousy and cupidity of modern Europe. And he thought he discovered more than "a speck of war" when he beheld a nation, powerful in finance and in arms, a natural rival, with strong incentives to hostility, and wedded to war, hanging like a dark and threatening cloud on our North and West. In short, his limited knowledge of human nature, and the annals of past times, led him to conclude, that with brighter auspices, indeed with towering auspices, we were destined to the same collisions as other nations, to contests protracted and severe. But whatever might be the views of that honorable body as to the policy of this measure, either as it regarded the Army or the general interests of the country, he hoped at least that justice would prevail. He hoped by the passage of the bill that they would bind up the soldier's wounds. That honorable gentleman from Kentucky, (pointing to Colonel JOHNSON,) who had received severe wounds while in the service of his country, well knew, that although to the soldier's mind death is divested of his terrors in the field, yet the reflection of being a maimed and crippled object, without the means of application or support, unhonored, forgot, or known only as an object of contumely, that calls forth indignation or affected pity, that excites disgust, was a terrible consideration. The noblest feelings of the heart are trampled on; wounds, which should be badges of honor, become monuments of disgrace. Let us, said Mr. C., by the passage of this bill, divest the mind of such humiliating fears, and inspire the defender of his country's rights while encountering disease, hardship, and danger in the field, with this consoling assurance, that, if killed, he would receive the benediction of his God; if wounded, he would be cheered with the smiles of his Government and country.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

FRIDAY, December 29.

Another member, to wit: from Maryland, ALEXANDER C. HANSON, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

The SPEAKER presented a memorial of the Legislature of the Mississippi Territory, praying that the fractional sections of public land in that Territory may be subdivided.—Referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The SPEAKER also presented a petition of the Legislature of the Mississippi Territory, praying that the officers and men who served under Lieutenant Colonel Nixon and Major Hinds may receive payment for their services.—Referred to the Committee on Arrangements of Militia Expenses incurred by States without authority of the General Government.

The SPEAKER also presented another petition of the Legislature aforesaid, praying that the said Territory may be erected into a State government, and that such State may be admitted into the Union.—Ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER presented another petition of the Legislature of the Territory aforesaid, praying that such inhabitants of their Territory as may have suffered losses by the hostile Indians, may be remunerated by grants of land out of the tracts lately ceded to the United States by the said Indians.—Referred to the committee appointed on the 14th instant, on a similar petition from the said Legislature.

Mr. YANCEY, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of William Morrisett, which was read; when Mr. Y. reported a bill for his relief; which was read twice, and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. STANFORD, from the committee appointed to revise the rules and orders of the House, made a report, which was read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. BIRDSALL, from the committee appointed on the petition of Henry Fanning, by leave of the House reported a bill for the relief of Henry Fanning; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Friday next.

An engrossed bill entitled "An act for the relief of the infirm, disabled, and superannuated officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary war, the late war, and the Army of the United States, for the time being;" was read the third time, and ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. THROOP, the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims were instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the rate of pensions to officers and soldiers disabled in the service of the United States during the late war with Great Britain; and also into the expediency of amending the law relative to the proof required from officers and privates in the militia to establish their claims to a pension.

On motion of Mr. PARRIS, the Committee on Military Affairs were instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the equitable liquidation of all claims for wages due the estates of such non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, as have died while in the service of the United States during the late war, upon the best evidence it may be in the power of the person or persons making application therefor, considering the nature of the claims respectively, to produce.

The bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, for enlarging the time for ascertaining transfers and changes of property affected by the act for laying a direct tax, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; as also was the bill for the relief of Charles Markle, giving him permission to change his entry of a purchase of public lands.

Mr. REYNOLDS, adverting to the decision of the House the other day against his motion for inquiring into the expediency of reducing the price of the public lands, said he hoped he should be more fortunate in another attempt to favor those disposed to settle and cultivate the public lands. The Government had just issued a proclamation for driving from the public land those who had actually settled on it. This was doubtless an unpleasant task to the Government, but it appeared that it had been thought a just policy. He now wished to give an opportunity to every man who wanted land to purchase ground enough to settle on. With this view he moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of subdividing quarter sections of land offered for sale, and also into the expediency of allowing a greater discount for the prompt payment of the purchase money.

The question to agree to this proposed resolution was decided in the negative, 53 to 40.

PETITION OF ANDREW MONTGOMERY.

A report on the petition of Andrew Montgomery, of the Mississippi Territory, an officer in the military service of the United States, who prayed compensation for a slave of his own who attended him as a servant, was brought up by Mr. YANCEY, from the Committee of Claims. The report was read, and was found to recommend a rejection of the claim.

On the question that the House do concur in the resolution of the committee,

Mr. WRIGHT rose, and, after giving it as his opinion that it would be unjust to reject the claim, moved that the consideration of the subject should be postponed.

Mr. YANCEY said, that it would be better to refer it to a Committee of the whole House, and moved to that effect; but the motion was lost.

Mr. Y. then, adverting to what had fallen from

Mr. WRIGHT, said that no difference in the color of men engaged as servants could operate to exclude the claim of compensation; but there was a difference between a free man and a slave taken as an attendant on an officer. The object of the petition was to obtain compensation for the value of the slave. If an officer, being allowed a waiter, gets a freeman to attend him, and that freeman were killed or disabled, would it enter into the contemplation of Congress, or of any man, to pay the value of that freeman? Wages were regularly allowed for the services of such attendants. But this petition asks for the wages for those services, and compensation for the value of the negro also. He considered the report as founded on just principles, and it would be confirmed.

Mr. WRIGHT entered at large into the discussion of the case. It being considered degrading and humiliating to military officers to do the drudgery of servitude about their persons, it had been the custom to allow them to take such a servant out of the ranks; in which situation, the man was as much exposed as if he were a soldier. His not being obliged to fight was no shield to him. And if the officer, by substituting a slave of his own, gave a man to the service, it was unjust that he should suffer the loss of so much property by the slave's falling in the course of his duty. Had the servant been a freeman, his representatives or relatives would be allowed compensation; and why should not the owner of a slave lost in the same way? Mr. W. disavowed any expectation that the petitioner should be allowed the whole value of the slave; but, that he ought to have some part of it, was in his opinion undeniable.

Mr. REYNOLDS, of Tennessee, reminded the House that they had just passed a bill to compensate owners for losses sustained in horses, mules, oxen, boats, and every kind of property; and yet a committee now told them that they ought to make an exception of this case, on no other grounds than the property lost being the slave of the officer. He insisted that it was no less incumbent on the House to pay for this than for a cart or a horse, unless it could be shown that a law existed declaring that loss of slaves should not be entitled to compensation.

Mr. YANCEY again spoke, and was answered by Mr. WRIGHT.

Mr. PICKERING put this question: If a white man were hired and killed, would they pay his widow the price of a man? He believed not. As to compensation to the wounded and maimed, Mr. P. observed they were granted, not because the men were wounded or maimed, but because they were rendered thereby incapable of supporting themselves; for, if they were killed, they got nothing.

Mr. HUGER thought it important that the principle involved in this case should be settled, and therefore suggested that the resolution should lie on the table, in order that gentlemen might revolve it in their minds. It was therefore proposed to let it lie till Tuesday, but refused.

Mr. H. then proceeded to observe, that he did not so much regard the interest of the owners as of the public, in what he was suggesting. With a view to the future, it was impolitic to discourage officers of the Southern States from bringing their own servants along with them into the field. The House should recollect, that, if a white man be employed as a servant, it detracts so much from the military force—it by so much lessens the army—and that it is besides a great advantage to have the slave brought, because he is had at a less expense. But no officer, he said, would venture his property in that way, if compensation be refused in this instance. For, if the slave be left at home, he is sure to bring in a handsome revenue to his owner, without any other than the ordinary risks of his life.

The question of concurrence was put, and passed in the affirmative.

ADMISSION OF MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. LATTIMORE, from the committee appointed on the 6th instant on a petition of the Legislature of the Mississippi Territory, and to whom was referred a petition of the inhabitants of said Territory respecting a census, made a detailed report, which was read; when Mr. L. reported a bill to enable the people of the Mississippi Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Tuesday next.

The report is as follows:

By the articles of agreement and cession between the United States and the State of Georgia, it is provided "that the territory thus ceded [now Mississippi Territory] shall form a State, and be admitted as such into the Union, as soon as it shall contain sixty thousand free inhabitants, or at an earlier period, if Congress shall think it expedient, on the same conditions and restrictions, with the same privileges, and in the same manner, as is provided in the ordinance of Congress of the 13th of July, 1787, for the government of the Western Territory of the United States; which ordinance shall, in all its parts, extend to the territory contained in the present act of cession, that article only excepted which forbids slavery."

The memorialists, after stating the number of persons taken under the last general census, which was forty thousand three hundred and fifty-two of all descriptions, and adverting to the accession of population produced by the annexation of a part of West Florida, and by subsequent emigrations, conclude that the Territory contained at that time (December, 1814) the number required by the agreement referred to above to entitle it to admission on an equal footing with the original States. As this, however, was a matter of conjecture and uncertainty, they solicit admission as an act of courtesy on the part of the United States.

Your committee possess no means of forming anything like a satisfactory estimate of the present population of the Territory in question; but they conceive that, unless it be the determination of Congress to defer its admission until it can be claimed in strict conformity to the compact with Georgia, there is no good reason for a further delay on the score of a deficiency of numbers, as such deficiency, if not now questionable, will not probably much longer exist. Without taking into consideration the recent settlers, who are subject to the late proclamation under the "act to prevent settlement being made," &c., the presumption is not unreasonable that, if any considerable part of the lands obtained from the Creeks be prepared for a legal settlement within the time contemplated, the Territory will contain more than the number required before it can be finally erected into a State.

It is known to your committee that the consent of Georgia to a division of this Territory has been asked, and obtained; and, should it be divided before it is admitted, the admission of either part would, from a want of numbers, be subject to additional objection and further delay. But doubts may be entertained whether the Territory can, with strict propriety, be divided without the consent of its inhabitants, as well as that of Georgia and of the United States. Although the people of the Territory had no agency in the agreement above granted they were the object of it, and as such became a third party to it, and vested by it of a right which is explicitly defined. This agreement provides "that the Territory thus ceded shall form a State, [not one or more States,] and shall be admitted as such into the Union, as soon as it shall contain sixty thousand free inhabitants." If, then, admission shall be deferred in consequence of division, the expectation of the inhabitants will be disappointed, and their right impaired. It is chiefly to avoid such a result that your committee have declined recommending a division of the Territory, which otherwise might be expedient to lessen the inconveniences which, with or without division, the local Government will, for a long time at least, have to sustain.

In relation to the simple question of admission, as presented by the memorialists, precedents are not wanting, either to encourage their application or to grant their request. The State of Ohio was admitted before it possessed the number which the ordinance required, and Louisiana did not come in, as to time or numbers, in virtue of a strict and insuperable claim. It is not improbable that the Mississippi Territory may contain at this time a greater population than either of these States did when they were admitted; and it is believed that its state of political minority and probation has been of longer duration than that of any of the adopted States. If, then, after fifteen years of restraint, the people of this country should evince even an impatient desire for enlargement, it is but just to ascribe it to that sense of independence which is common to the nation, and which should be rather encouraged than depressed. It is a policy worthy of a Government which is constituted and maintained by the public will to foster throughout the Union those feelings which give energy to the national character, and to extend to every portion of it those rights which conduce to the general good. Nor could a period more propitious to these ends be selected than the present, when all American citizens have new cause to approve of their principles, to confide in their institutions, and to be proud of their name.

So far your committee have considered this subject as though an immediate admission of the Territory were desired by all of its inhabitants; but they are not prepared to say that such is the fact. While it is true that such admission has been repeatedly solicited for a succession of years, it is also true that, about four years ago, a small minority of the representative branch of the Territorial Legislature protested against it, and that, about a year thereafter, a considerable number of the people themselves petitioned that all proceedings in Congress on the subject might be postponed. It was on these two occasions only, as your committee believe, that any indisposition to a State government has been expressed to the National Legislature by any of the people of the Territory, or of their representatives in their behalf. Nor is it understood or believed that the reluctance manifested by a portion of these people arose from a want of a due and equal appreciation of the rights and advantages of an independent State. The causes of opposition, so far as any opposition has been shown, seem to have been, in part, an unwillingness to incur additional expense in supporting a State Government while under a peculiar pressure from the war; but chiefly an apprehension that a State Government, with its inseparable appendage, a federal district court, would be immediately followed by a great number of expensive and dangerous, if not ruinous, lawsuits for lands, which would grow out of (what are called) the Yazoo and British claims. The war, however, is now at an end, and the Yazoo claims may be considered as quieted; but the British claims still exist, and constitute the subject of several petitions now before Congress, on which it is not the province of your committee to speak.

The petitions of sundry inhabitants east of Pearl river, in the same Territory, which also have been referred to your committee as having relation to the question which has been considered, state that the eastern parts of said Territory have not an equal share of representation with the western in the Territorial Legislature; suggest an apprehension that such inequality may continue under a State Government; and pray that provision may be made for taking a census of the people of the Territory, for the purpose of securing to all a representation according to numbers and equal rights. If the interposition of Congress be necessary to effect what the petitioners seem to have principally in view, namely, a fair representation in the convention which will be elected to form a constitution, some general provision to this end will properly belong to the act authorizing the convention to be chosen; and should it nevertheless afterwards appear to the satisfaction of Congress that any part of the Territory has not had its due proportion of representation in such convention, they will no doubt use the corrective which they possess, in rejecting the constitution which may be formed.

Upon a full view of the whole subject which has been referred to the consideration of your committee, they are of opinion that it is expedient to admit the Mississippi Territory into the Union as prayed for by the memorialists, and have prepared a bill for this purpose, which they ask leave to report.

MILITARY ACADEMIES.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for establishing three additional Military Academies.

Mr. CAMPBELL proposed to change the location of the Southern Academy from Mount Dearborn to Columbia, on account of the superior advantages of that place over Mount Dearborn, and the eligibility of its situation for such an institution.

Mr. PICKENS was in favor of a more upland site than either of those mentioned, and gave a decided preference of the two to Mount Dearborn over Columbia. He proposed a point in Buncombe county.

Some further debate took place on this motion, which was strenuously advocated by Mr. CHAPPELL, and opposed by Mr. PICKENS and Mr. HULBERT.

The motion was negatived by a large majority.

Mr. PICKENS then moved to substitute "Ashville, in Buncombe county, North Carolina," in lieu of "Mount Dearborn, South Carolina;" which motion was also negatived by a considerable majority.

Mr. BURNSIDE moved to amend the bill, so as to establish an academy at Carlisle, Pennsylvania, in addition to the three named in the bill. He thought it due to the extent and population of Pennsylvania, to establish one in that State; and Carlisle, he said, was peculiarly fitted for the location of a Military Academy, by its salubrity, the military establishment of the United States already there, &c.

This motion was also negatived by a large majority.

Mr. PICKENS then moved to amend the bill so as to limit the number of additional academies to two, one within the District of Columbia, and one at Ashville, in Buncombe county, the advantages of which situation he explained to the House.

This motion was opposed by Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. When he concluded—

On motion of Mr. PICKENS, the Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

COMMERCE WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. FORSYTH, from the Committee of Foreign Relations, reported the following bill:

A bill to regulate the commerce between the territories of the United States and of His Britannic Majesty, according to the Convention concluded the third day of July, 1815.

Be it enacted, &c., That the same duties be, and the same are hereby, imposed on articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture, of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe, imported into the United States in British vessels, as are or shall be imposed on the importation of the like articles in American vessels.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the same tonnage and other duties and charges are hereby imposed on British vessels, in any ports of the United States, as are or may be payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States, except such British vessels as shall come from the East or West Indies or the dominions of His Britannic Majesty in North America.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the same bounty shall be allowed on the exportation of any article, the growth, produce, or manufacture, of the United States, to His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe, when such exportation shall be in British vessels, as are, or may be allowed, when such exportation is or may be in vessels of the United States.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That in all cases where drawbacks are or may be allowed on the re-exportation of any goods, the growth, produce, or manufacture of the territories of His Britannic Majesty, the same drawbacks shall be allowed on such re-exportation, where the original importation of the same may have been in British vessels, as are or may be allowed on such re-exportation where the original importation may have been in vessels of the United States.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That so much of each and every act of Congress as is inconsistent with the provisions of this act be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That this act shall continue in force until the 3d day of July, 1819, and no longer.

The bill was twice read and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

The House adjourned, to meet again on Tuesday next.

TUESDAY, January 2, 1816.

Mr. PARRIS presented a petition of a committee on behalf of the non-commissioned officers and soldiers of the 21st regiment of infantry, of the United States, praying that they may have the privilege of locating the land to which they, and those who may have left the said regiment, are entitled, in one entire body.—Referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, presented a petition of sundry manufacturers of cotton and woollen goods in the town of Brunswick, and District of Maine, praying that the importation of all cotton goods from India may be prohibited, and that additional duties may be imposed on cotton goods imported from other countries; also, that the importation of coarse woollen goods may be prohibited.

Mr. CLAYTON presented a similar petition from sundry manufacturing establishments on the Brandywine river and its vicinity, in the State of Delaware, in behalf of themselves and others interested in similar establishments.—Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. CLAYTON presented a petition of Allen McLane, one of the surviving officers of the Revolutionary army, praying that the half pay for life, which was solemnly promised to him by the Congress of 1780, may now be granted to him, substantially, to commence from the time of the reduction of that army.—Referred to the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. LEWIS presented a petition of the members of a masonic society in Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, under the name of the Alexandria Washington Lodge, No. 22, praying that they may be authorized, by lottery, to raise a sum of money, to be applied to the building of a house for the use of a public museum.

Mr. ROBERTSON presented a petition of David Porter, a Captain in the Navy of the United States, praying that he may be allowed the exclusive privilege of navigating, for a limited time, the waters of the District of Columbia with vessels built on his plan, and worked by animal power.—Referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, made a report on the petition of the President and Commissioners of the town of Mobile, which was read, and the resolution therein contained was concurred in by the House as follows:

Resolved, That the petitioners have leave to withdraw their petition.

Mr. STEVENSON presented a petition of the Legislature of the Territory of Illinois, praying that certain evils existing in the judicial system of the said Territory may be remedied, and that they may be empowered in future to pass laws regulating the courts of said Territory.—Referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ROBERTSON also made a report on the petition of James Horne, and Joshua Horne, which was concurred in by the House.

Mr. WRIGHT from the committee on that part of the President's Message which relates to an arrangement of the militia expenses incurred by States without the sanction of the General Government, reported a bill to authorize the settlement and payment of certain claims for the services of the militia, which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Tuesday next.

Mr. BRADBURY, from the committee appointed on the petition of James Jewett, reported a bill to authorize the discharge of James Jewett from his imprisonment, which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of State, communicating such particulars as are known to the Department of State concerning the publication of a new edition of the laws of the United States, in obedience to a resolution of the 26th ultimo, which was ordered to lie on the table.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Charles Markin," was read a third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act to enlarge the time for ascertaining the annual transfers and changes of property subject to the direct tax, and for other purposes," was read the third time, and passed.

MILITARY ACADEMIES.

The House, according to the order of the day, again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for establishing three additional Military Academies.

The amendment on the table at the former sitting on this subject, (viz: on motion of Mr. PICKENS to limit the increase to two academies, one within the District of Columbia and one at Ashville, Buncombe county, North Carolina,) was taken up, and rejected.

Mr. WILDE then proposed to amend the bill so as to establish one additional academy only, and that one within the District of Columbia. This motion he supported by arguments going to show the expediency of such an institution being as much as possible of a national character, and under the eye of the Government. His object was not to diminish the number of cadets, but to give to the institution of the Military Academies, as far as possible, a national character, which, he thought, would be assisted by depriving them of local or sectional features, &c.

Mr. PICKERING was in favor of so much of the proposed amendment as went to limit the number of additional academies to one, but opposed to the location of that one in the District of Columbia. He preferred that it should be located at Harper's Ferry, a point which he appeared to consider as invested with great advantages, from its being already the site of an armory, from its situation being very healthy, and in the midst of a country fertile in all the necessaries of life.

Mr. SHERFFEY required a division of the question, so as to place the question simply before the House, whether the additional number of academies should be one or three.

Mr. CUTHBERT said he was in favor of both branches of the amendment which had been proposed by his colleague, (Mr. WILDE.) War, he said, was a subject which came within the direction of the General Government only, having relation exclusively to foreign Powers. Unquestionably, therefore, the preparations for war, whether of one kind or another, whether relating to military education or the collection of the munitions of war, should be exclusively under the control of the General Government, and have no relation to the States. It should be an object to prevent the military system from having anything in it peculiar to the States, and to make it purely national. What would produce this most effectually in regard to the Military Academies? To have one in one State and one in another, or to have one only, and that in the District, which belongs to the United States, under the eyes of the Government? Certainly the latter. What could be more dangerous to the tranquillity of the nation, than a military rivalry among the States? What ought we to be more anxious to prevent—what could be more dangerous to the prosperity of the Government—what could more threaten that disunion of the States which we ought most to dread and guard against, than this sort of military rivalry? There would be a danger, he argued, from establishing separate Military Academies at different points, of a rivalry, amounting to animosity, arising between the officers educated in the different academies, and propagating and diffusing itself among the mass of the people. The establishment of a single Military Academy at this point, he thought, would have a directly opposite tendency. Young men from different States associating together, and liberalizing each other, would imbibe and carry with them to their homes that national character which alone can be the cement of the Union. The object of Congress, then, should be to establish an academy of this kind, where our youth should become attached, not to the particular interests of particular States, but to the dignity and splendor of the nation; where they should acquire, not State feelings, but patriotic sentiments. Men thus educated would attach more closely the interests of all the States, instead of promoting jealousy among them. The objection to the situation within this District, that it would be too near a populous city, was not valid, inasmuch as the character of the institution depended not so much on its peculiar situation as on the regulations by which it was governed. Every Military Academy was in some respects a military monastery, and under its rigid regulations the students in an academy in or near this city would be as much cut off from intercourse with it, as if the academy were three thousand miles distant from it. This was, in another view, a peculiarly proper position for a Military Academy. Being the Seat of Government, besides the place of assemblage of the legislators from different parts of the Union, which would enable parents to keep up intercourse with their children, it was also the resort of all foreigners of information who visit the country, and would afford to the institution all the benefit of their experience, as well as that of the intelligence of our own country. The great objection to multiplying Military Academies was this: that when they are once established, they cannot be abolished, however inexpedient they may be found. Restricting the number now, there would be no difficulty in increasing them hereafter. But establish an academy in Carolina and one in Kentucky, and by any attempt hereafter to abolish either of them, the State will consider itself as insulted, and oppose it accordingly. He was in favor, therefore, of establishing only one at present. Perhaps the plan contained in the bill was not complete; perhaps there ought to be one large and several subordinate academies. If so, let there be established one principal academy here, and harmonious subordinate institutions elsewhere. In any point of view, he approved of the amendment proposed by his colleague.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, opposed the motion, as calculated to destroy the bill. The object of making us one people, he said, was one dear to his heart; so sacred that he would oppose no Constitutional measures calculated to promote it. But if it was now contended that a great national Military Academy was to aid effectually in that important object, by collecting at one point and amalgamating the military spirit of the nation, this proposition did not go far enough. It ought also to propose to abolish the Academy at West Point, so as to leave but the one now proposed to be established here. Mr. J. could not assent to the idea of rivalry between the States in consequence of multiplying the Military Academies. What, he asked, in this view, had been the effect of the institution at West Point? Had any local jealousy or rivalry been produced by it? On the contrary, it was admitted on all hands that it had produced very beneficial effects without any such alloy. If a great military institution could be established at this place, calculated to effect the object the gentleman had at heart, he should not perhaps object to it; but the objections which had been made to establishing other academies applied with equal force to West Point as to those now proposed to be established at other points. Mr. J. made some observations going to establish the great advantages to be derived from these Military Academies compared with the expense of them. The people of every section of our country, he said, had spirit to vindicate their rights, if they were instructed in the mode of doing it. Officers only were wanted to lead them on, and impart to them the benefit of the instruction which they have received; and no method of forming officers could be compared, for efficacy and economy, to that by Military Academies. The expense of all the academies now proposed, including the pay of professors, support of cadets, &c., he showed, by a statement from the proper authority, would not exceed $400,000 annually—a small sum indeed compared to the object. He concluded by saying that he was opposed to any modification of the bill whatever.

Mr. HULBERT also spoke against the proposed amendment. He was opposed to it, because he believed the adoption of it would be the destruction of the bill. He had belonged to the committee which had reported the bill, and had given it in its present shape his hearty assent. He believed it necessary that the institution of the Military Academies should be enlarged in some shape or other. If the one at West Point could be sufficiently enlarged, he had no objection to that course; but within his recollection, he said, attempts had been made to remove that at West Point and establish it here. To that plan he was utterly opposed; and, should the present motion succeed, he believed it would put an end to the idea of enlarging the Military Academy at all. Mr. H. appeared to be satisfied that the establishment of one additional academy only, and that one in this District, could not succeed. He was decidedly of opinion that we ought to have more cadets than we now have at military schools, gaining that instruction in military science, for the want of which we failed so greatly in the opening of the late war. The disgraces we have suffered, and costs we have incurred, during that war, for the want of this instruction, form a strong argument in favor of multiplying the means of obtaining it. When the army went into the field at the commencement of the late war, its officers had just been selected from civil life, without reference to their military science or experience—defeat and disgrace were the consequences. He adverted to the maxim, that an army of hares, commanded by a lion, were better than an army of lions, commanded by a hare. In the spirit of this maxim, Mr. H. contended that, to prepare the nation for war, we ought not to have a large Military Establishment in time of peace, but men of science in every part of the nation ready to take the field in time of danger. If a war be considered just, said he, there will never be any difficulty in raising an army in this country; the people will turn out en masse, if they have officers qualified to command them. If, by means of Military Academies, eight hundred cadets are constantly in a course of instruction, there will be no difficulty in finding proper persons to command an army of any extent we may ever want. It might be said that eight hundred cadets would be too many—he did not believe it. We have seven millions of people, and if we are again involved in war and have to select some thousand officers, we should not find too many cadets to choose from. He denied the probability of jealousy or rivalry between the States from the establishment of several academies; on the contrary, the effect of the establishment at this place of one only, would be to excite that very jealousy that gentlemen dreaded. Alluding to the distance of some of the Southern and Western States, Louisiana particularly, from West Point, and even from the District of Columbia, he said, there ought to be an academy south of this place. The committee had recommended only three in addition to that at West Point. The people of the North, he believed, would be perfectly satisfied with that one. They had already been more than once alarmed with the idea of removing that academy. He hoped that their alarm never would be realized, but that the academy would remain at West Point as long as the rock on which it is built. The committee had agreed to establish one here and one in South Carolina; and objections having been made from the West to this distribution, the committee had agreed to recommend one there also. The Western country, he said, was increasing with unexampled rapidity—he wished it was not increasing quite so fast—but the territory beyond the Alleghany, he believed, would soon contain a majority of the people of the United States; and their claim, therefore, could not be denied to a participation in the benefits of this institution. Mr. H. said, he was satisfied the locations in the bill were as good as could be made. He knew very well it was the opinion of some of the leading members of the Administration that we should have but one academy, and that that one ought to be here; but that this was not the proper place for it, he thought, was very evident. He wished the bill to pass as it now stood. He was pleased in the opportunity of giving his assent to this recommendation of the President. He rejoiced, he said, to see such recommendations from that quarter; they reminded him of the good old times when WASHINGTON, and those who followed his maxims and principles, ruled the nation. He was glad to see these recommendations, founded on good old principles, proceed from one who had been a little estranged heretofore. He hoped that the bill would pass without the proposed amendment.

Mr. WILDE replied to some of the objections which had been made to his motion. As to the academy at West Point, he said, if it were now for the first time proposed to establish an academy there, he should oppose it with all his powers, even were he a Representative from the State of New York. He objected to the separation of the academy into several parts in different States, not so much on the score of jealousy or rivalry which it would create among the States, as on the score of his radical objection to the tendency of such a course to increase the dependence of the General Government on the State Governments. Wherever national establishments were proposed, even now, it would appear as if those States which have the greatest political influence must have some gratification conferred on them, before they would consent to measures which could not be carried without their consent. It would be found to be so, when the question of navy yards, of a national university, or any other question of a national character, became the subject of discussion. None, Mr. W. said, was more convinced than he was of the value of having good commanders in an army; and the necessity of proper qualifications for that purpose by military education was too trite a remark to require elucidation; nor was it less doubtful that our arms had occasionally failed during the late war from the want of proper commanders. A few months, or even weeks, were all that was required to form soldiers for the field, but time was required to form accomplished commanders. He was therefore fully impressed with the utility of Military Academies; but he was in favor of such an establishment being purely national, and therefore located at or near the Seat of Government; in which proposition he hoped to unite all those who, having no local feeling or predilections to gratify, looked only to the necessity of having this institution under the eyes of the Government, and within its control. The state of the times was an objection heretofore made to this measure, which no longer existed. We have found, from experience, that the present Military Establishment, though comparatively small, has furnished us with some of the best officers for our Army, and have every reason to expect proportionate benefits from it, if enlarged on a liberal scale, and in such a manner as shall give it an entirely national instead of local character.

Mr. WRIGHT advocated the general objects of the bill at some length. He illustrated the necessity of education for military men, by reasons drawn from analogy. For instance, said he, would you trust a physician to bleed you without a certainty that he possessed some skill in the surgical art? Surely not; and will you commit the liberties of the country to those who know nothing of their duty? Mr. W. was in favor of establishing as many academies as would accommodate eight hundred students, but against locating one immediately at the Seat of Government, thinking it would be more expedient to establish it higher up the Potomac. Otherwise the places designated in the bill were as geographically correct as they could possibly be. As to the idea of exciting jealousy or undue rivalry, by dividing the academies, he said he hoped there always would be a proper rivalry—a rivalry of merit and services among those educated at one or the other of these academies. He thought the disposition of the four academies, at different points, was an argument in favor of the bill instead of against it, because it would bring academies nearer to those who desired to send their children to them, &c.

Mr. CLAY, (Speaker,) in reference to the argument in support of the amendment, that the moral effect of establishing three additional academies, instead of one only, and that at the Seat of Government, would be injurious to the Union, as tending to create sectional feeling, &c.; said that all arguments, founded upon the supposition of danger to the Union, deserved great consideration; but, whilst he applauded the motives of gentlemen in urging these arguments, he was obliged totally to differ from them in their conclusions. The moral effect of establishing several, instead of one institution of this kind, would be to increase the affection of the people for the Union. If the bond of union was to be strengthened by the measures of the Government, what ought to be the character of them? What ought to be the policy of the Government? To distribute benefits; to afford to every man in the Union an obvious, palpable evidence of the benefits afforded to him by the Government under which he lives. If the proposition were to establish four or five turnpike roads in different parts of the Union, he said he should suppose the argument of the danger of creating a sectional influence would as much apply to that measure as to a proposition for the diffusion through the nation of that knowledge—the want of which during the late war we had but too much reason, from fatal experience, to regret. It would be by making the Government strong without, and furnishing motives of affection to every bosom within, that they would inculcate the sentiments which the advocates of this amendment were so desirous to inspire. Mr. C. said, he would afford the means of instruction, as far as possible, to every man bound to raise an arm in defence of the nation. With what sentiments would such a policy inspire the bosom of the citizen? Would it excite sectional feelings? No; the bosom turns with thankfulness to the source of benefits received, as unerringly as the needle to the pole. The individual receiving the advantages afforded by these institutions would not look to any particular State, but would trace his obligation to the fountain-head, and to the support and strength of the Union all his exertions would be directed. Whatever may be the destination of the student, whether to civil or military life, if the principles of human nature govern him, he will always reflect, that to the parental care and beneficence of the Government he is indebted for the advantages he has received, and to the support of that Government his best exertions will be given. If gentlemen were right in their argument, Mr. C. said, we ought to commence anew; we should abolish the academy already existing at West Point, and let there be but one, and that one within the District of Columbia. Mr. C. said he, with the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. HULBERT,) approved of the recommendations in the President's Message on this and other subjects, whether they were the doctrines of new or of old times. From that quarter of the Union, however, (the West,) which that gentleman had so feelingly regretted was growing too fast—a regret in which, Mr. C. said, the gentleman would excuse him from participating—he did not believe there was one student in the present Military Academy. The remark equally applied to the South; and yet in those sections of the country there were, perhaps, thousands of young men who would be peculiarly happy in obtaining the benefits of such an institution, if brought within their reach. He would, therefore, establish academies in the different sections of the Union. The effort was as vain to disguise as to forget that there are various sections of our country; gentlemen might argue in vain against a fact, which the geography of the country most clearly established. We must take our natural boundaries as they are, since we cannot alter or abolish them. Mr. C. said, in conclusion, he would not take from other sections the benefits of this institution to consolidate and locate it within this District, on account of its supposed unhealthiness and for other reasons. He would not alter the present features of the bill because of objections to them, which he considered fanciful and visionary. The distribution of the academies he thought might have been more advantageously made, particularly as regarded the one in the Western country; but he would not, therefore, deprive any section of the country of the great advantages which he hoped this institution would diffuse throughout the Union.

Mr. CUTHBERT rose to correct an error into which he said the gentleman had fallen in regard to the education at West Point being confined entirely to Northern youth. If nothing else proved it an error, the name of McREE was sufficient, who was from a Southern State. He instanced other cases within his knowledge of students from the South. Let it be recollected, said Mr. C., that we have been long in a state of peace; during which time the attention of the country was not turned to military affairs; and it could not be expected that many would then desire to send their children to such a seminary. But would any one argue, he said, that our notions on military affairs were the same now that they were three or four years ago? No; the glory reaped by our army, its utility as proved by the events of the war, had changed the general opinions on this subject; and, consequently, there were now many applications for admission into the Military Academy. The argument which likened the case of the establishment of academies, to that of turnpike roads, afforded its own refutation. Those very roads, by promoting general intercourse, were a part of the means most conducive to the object of Mr. C. in fixing the academy at the Seat of Government, which was the promotion of a nationality of sentiment. This argument therefore would not stand. The gentleman from Kentucky had said that cadets would always look to the hand which supported them. Mr. C. was for bringing them in closer contact with that hand, so that their attention could not be diverted from it by local feelings, &c.

Mr. FORSYTH said he was of the committee which reported the bill now before the House, and coincided in opposition to the proposed amendment. It was conceded on all hands, he said, that the institution of West Point had been of great service to the community, and that its beneficial effects had not been lessened by its sectional situation. It appeared to be admitted, Mr. F. said, that there ought to be an increase of the number of cadets; and the only question was, whether it should be by the addition of one or three schools. The committee had been of opinion that two hundred youths in one place were as many as could be conveniently attended to by the few officers employed at each academy; he had not changed his opinion on that subject, and wastherefore opposed to the proposed amendment. The motive of the proposed amendment, he said, was laudable: proceeding from a desire to obviate the possibility of local jealousies. Was there anything, he asked, in the nationality of the District of Columbia, to prevent the operation of these feelings? Do we not know, said he, that if these local feelings are felt in any portion of the United States, they are felt in a still stronger degree within this District; there was, he said, nothing in the nationality of the spot to destroy them. The benefit which might arise from the academy being placed immediately "under the eyes of the Government" appeared not to be denied. Cast your eyes, (said Mr. F.,) around the District of Columbia; are there any proofs of its having derived any particularly great benefits from having been under the exclusive care of the General Government? No; on the contrary, though it has been constantly under the eyes of Congress, it has as constantly been neglected. Look at the statute book, said he. Congress has the exclusive legislation over this District; and how has Congress legislated for it? I had occasion the other day to turn to the laws on this subject, and I am almost ashamed to state the result of my inquiry. Half a dozen statutes of little importance embrace all that this Legislature has done for the District for near twenty years that it has been under its eyes and exclusive care. The laws of the District were not even uniform in its various parts. Crimes in one part of the District are punished in one way, and in another part differently. Whilst the condition of the citizens of Maryland and Virginia were experiencing a daily amelioration of their condition, by the improvement of their jurisprudence, the system of laws by which this District was governed remained stationary, as they existed when the District formed a part of those two States. If the District of Columbia had not flourished or improved under the care of Congress, what evidence was there that the Military Academy, under similar circumstances, would derive any advantage from such a location? Mr. F. said, for his part, he believed the Military Academy placed here would enjoy just the same advantage that had accrued to this District from the care of Congress; and, if the old Academy had been placed here, he believed it never would have produced the same results as had been experienced from it. His colleague (Mr. CUTHBERT) and others appeared to be very anxious to destroy State feelings and jealousy and pride—Mr. F. said they ought to be destroyed. But why fight the shadow, and let the substance pass? These feelings of local animosity, he said, were cherished by other causes than such as that supposed by his colleague; of these he would refer to but one; the constant practice of selecting Ministers and great officers of the Government from local considerations; of taking, for instance, a man of inferior merit from one State, because there happens to be already one in service from the State from whence a better might have been selected. To such practices as these, he said, we must look for the nourishment of local feelings and State jealousies. The object of the diffusion of these institutions was not the benefit or convenience of the States, but of the people, and their convenience was consulted by the distribution of academies at different points. In regard to the argument of brotherly affection among the cadets being promoted by collecting them all together at one point, Mr. F. said there was no magical effect in the location within the ten miles square. Every object in this respect might be accomplished by their collection at any one point, wherever it may be, by a provision, legislative or otherwise, that the youth of the South should be placed in an academy in the North, and vice versa, or by having them intermingled in the academies, in due proportion from every section, one among another. All the benefits argued as likely to proceed from concentration, may thus be secured. Mr. F. was, therefore, wholly against the amendment.

Mr. CALHOUN said, the only question really before the House at this time appeared to be, what was the best mode to produce a national spirit. That policy, he said, which creates the best political system; which promotes the national prosperity; which provides efficiently for the national security; that policy, by the effect of which every part of the country feels itself secure, whilst commerce is prosperous, and agriculture and manufactures are protected; that, he said, was the policy which would certainly create a true national feeling. Everything in opposition to such a policy would end in sectional feelings. Applying these general remarks to the present question, what, he asked, was the object of the bill? To establish a military school. What was the object of this school? To contribute to the national security, by the diffusion of military knowledge. Whether one great central school was better calculated to produce this effect, than several separate schools, was the question. Mr. C. said he believed it would not. If we had a central great school, as now proposed, it would principally be filled with the sons of wealthy men; of great and influential men, others would not have the means of sending their sons abroad for education; for here, certainly, the allowance by the Government would not cover the expenses of the young men. Where, in this country, shall we look for genius and talent? Most indubitably in the middle ranks; in the lower ranks in preference to the higher: not that these classes actually contain a greater portion of talent, but that they have stronger stimulants to its exertion. Rich men, being already at the top of the ladder, have no further motive to climb. It is that class of the community who find it necessary to strive for elevation, that furnishes you with officers. Look, said Mr. C., at the officers who distinguished themselves in service during the late war. Were there among them the sons of wealthy men or great men? If there were any such, Mr. C. said, he knew of none. The rule he applied was a general one. If the school were established here, the means of support afforded by the Government to the cadets would not cover their expenses; men in moderate circumstances would be unable to send their sons, and the country would be deprived of their valuable services. The academy would be in a great measure filled by the sons of the wealthy and influential men within four hundred miles of this place. Mr. C. said he believed the provisions of this bill were more important than any yet on the table of the House, and as important as any that would come before the House at the present session. The way to render the nation secure, is not by maintaining a large foreign army, very expensive and a little dangerous; it is not thus you will keep up a proper military spirit; but by military education. Upon the officers of armies in a great measure depends, particularly in a free Government, the success of war. Free Governments always afford materials for soldiers. Of the celebrated brigade of Scott, Mr. C. said, three-fourths of the privates had not been in service more than six months. All that was wanted to make soldiers among us was education, which the private can soon acquire; but the making of officers is the work of time, particularly in the present state of the science of war—and it was proper, therefore, to provide amply for that object. In time of war, Mr. C. said, we ought to get soldiers speedily, we ought to come into the population at once, by the measure so much reprobated at the last session from the other side of the House. Mr. C. was in favor of establishing more than one additional military school, in order to diffuse, as far as possible, military science. This, he said, would secure us against invasion from abroad, and, by making the militia formidable against despotism at home. It was in this way that militia would be made more efficient than in any other. At present, the number of academies proposed to be established might be sufficient; but he hoped that they would be progressively increased, and that it would not be long before we should have one in every considerable State in the Union. Mr. C. compared the feelings of the House now and previous to the war. Now, he said, we see everywhere a nationality of feeling; we hear sentiments from every part of the House in favor of union, and against a sectional spirit. What had produced this change? The glory acquired by the late war, and the prosperity which had followed it. Let us direct our attention, then, said he, to the objects calculated to accomplish the prosperity and greatness of the nation, and we shall certainly create a national spirit.

Mr. TUCKER, after some general remarks on the utility of institutions of this description, spoke on the particular question before the House. If we were to have but one or even two academies, and that one or two confined to a particular section of the Union, what would be the effect of this arrangement? To make officers only for that part of the country where the schools were established. In the event of war, where were the officers to be found whom this institution is to create? If military instruction were confined to one section, so, necessarily, must be the selection of officers for your armies; and thus sectional feelings will inevitably be created. By such a course, moreover, we should make one part of the country strong, and another relatively weak. The whole argument in favor of this bill—and without the argument the bill was nothing—was, that it was calculated to create military power by giving military science. The very argument on which the whole bill depended, was a sufficient argument in favor of its being general in its scope, embracing every section of the Union. The argument of the advantage of associating young men from every part of the country together, was not as forcible as the considerations which opposed the proposed limitation of the number of academies. If we were to have one only, he was, although friendly to the interest of this District, opposed to its being placed here. If, instead of the mild and amiable man at the head of our Government, we had an ambitious individual there, what would he ask more of you, than to put all the military officers under his influence, and thus subject them wholly to his control? He hoped the House would decide that the number proposed was few enough, though there might be better locations perhaps selected, &c.—for there certainly ought not to be an academy established at any place, from which, for the safety of the cadets, it would be necessary at any season of the year to remove.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, was in favor of the amendment. It would be so expensive travelling, that the constituents of gentlemen from Virginia and Kentucky would not bring their children to the school. What did they think of the situation of the people of the State which he represented? Travelling from Carolina or Kentucky to the Seat of Government might be expensive; but the trouble of going from Louisiana to Carolina, or the mouth of the Kentucky river, was infinitely more so. Yet, on the part of the people of Louisiana, whose interests were thus affected, he felt no hesitation in saying that the influence of the general principles ought to outweigh these considerations; and he should prove his conviction in this respect by voting for the amendment. Ideas had been broached this day, which, he said, were new to him. How long since we had been taught to look for the preservation of the Union to a military spirit? In such a spirit generally pervading the militia, he agreed, the liberties of the nation found a safe protection; but, instead of allowing that spirit to pervade the community, the favorite object of some gentlemen was to erect it into a separate and distinct establishment. Instead of one of the most important, he considered this bill as one of the most unimportant bills which could come before the House of a general nature during the present session. We had during the war but one military school; and now, in a state of peace, gentlemen had suddenly discovered the necessity of establishing four military schools. As one, Mr. R. said, he saw no necessity for it. He preferred to have but one academy, and that at the Seat of Government. No local considerations produced this preference on his mind, but it arose from the general impression that, next to travelling through the country, and examining the habits and customs of its different parts, the best way of extinguishing State jealousies and local feelings, was to associate the youths of the different parts of the country as much as possible. Let us establish then, he said, institutions for the civil and military education of youth within this District—a District belonging not peculiarly to any part of the country, but having more than any other an interest in the prosperity of every part of it. Let us, said Mr. R., lay aside sectional feelings; let us consider ourselves, in this hall, as members of the General Government; let us promote the general interest, and, my word for it, said he, the States will take care of themselves. If a national influence be produced by the establishment of a military school, would not the effect be much more general if the institution were established at the Seat of Government, than if at any other point? He thought it would; he was satisfied that the youth of the country ought to come here for their education, whence communications could be readily made to every part of the country; where their education and general welfare could be superintended by those who annually reside some time at the Seat of Government from the respective States, and where the mode of education could be generally known and properly appreciated. In order to prevent, as far as possible, the creation of a military spirit distinct from the general interest, and to give all possible advantage, utility, and economy to the establishment, he was in favor of the amendment.

Mr. SERGEANT was in favor of the amendment, because he considered one academy as sufficient, in addition to the one now in existence; but he was opposed to placing the new academy within the District of Columbia. He considered this institution as a school for soldiers. If the course of education should consume four years, under the plan proposed by this bill, there would be annually discharged from the academy (having completed their military education) about two hundred young men. The present Army Establishment, Mr. S. said, embraced about five hundred officers, he believed. The number, therefore, who would annually complete their military education, would be much greater than could be employed in the Army, which was the object of their instruction at the public expense. It had been said, that they would make officers for the militia; but, after coming out of the schools, if they were not put into the Army, they must betake themselves to other occupations, and would soon lose in other pursuits the military knowledge they had gained; the soldier would be sunk in the citizen. Allow ten years to elapse after the conclusion of his education, before his talents are put to use, and the cadet will be but little superior in military capacity to the general mass of the community. It appeared to him, Mr. S. said, that this bill was calculated to give an unreasonable extension to the idea of military education, though he approved of a reasonable increase of the present system. If four academies were established in different sections of the country, other sections would come forward and put in their claims; and Congress would be constantly pressed, by the strong motive of gratifying particular sections of the country, to increase the number, without a deliberate regard to the actual wants of the country. The argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. HULBERT,) in favor of the number of three, was, that it was difficult to produce a consentaneous sentiment in favor of one place; it was, in substance, that we must have four, because we ought to have two. Mr. S. said, he had heard nothing going to show that the establishment at West Point could not be sufficiently extended; and for his part, he said, he should prefer that course. A great deal had been said of national spirit and national feelings, which would be cultivated, it was argued, by the establishment of the additional academy at this place. If he were to hazard an opinion on this subject, it would be, that this was the worst place in the Union to establish an academy. If political or party dissension inflames any part of the country, is not this the place in which it burns with intense heat? It must, from the necessity of the case, be so. How, then, can you expect young men, assembled here, to escape its contagion? He placed the question in another view. He said that the separation of the youth from their homes and from society, and placing them at a distance, where they are all equally strangers, and where there are no lines of distinction, would make them as brothers, would give to them all a common interest and common object. He should, in this view, consider West Point or Harper's Ferry as a better situation for the academy than any populous city. At those points, the young men assembled would become citizens of the United States. Mr. S. acknowledged the force of the argument, that you do a great deal towards creating a national feeling, by giving us something worthy of our respect. Make our country strong, and you make men proud of it. Apply the argument. Would this effect, he asked, be produced by dividing the military talent we possess among different institutions? No, the object would be defeated, unless men who excel in the different branches of science could be found for instructors; and he much doubted whether there could be obtained, with the inducements offered by this bill, men of proper abilities and attainments for four Military Academies. He would greatly prefer to extend the Academy at West Point. The distance from some sections of the Union was not so great an object as was represented. It mattered nothing to the young soldier whether he was an hundred or a thousand miles from home. He who takes to that occupation knows beforehand it is one of privation and hardship, and he expects to meet with both from the moment he takes the sword in hand. The distance from his home is to him of no consequence. In bringing young men all together at one place, Congress would do something, he said, towards promoting that national feeling and harmony of sentiment which is so often spoken of. If it could be shown that one institution would not educate as many young men as were necessary to be instructed, then the ground would be fairly laid for increasing the number. Unless it should be, he should vote against the number proposed.

The question was then taken on striking out three, and inserting one, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 91.

The question to make the corresponding amendment in the section, viz: to strike out all respecting the location of the academies, except what relates to the one proposed to be established in the District of Columbia, was also decided in the affirmative.

Mr. PICKERING then moved to strike out the words "within the District of Columbia," and insert, "at or near Harper's Ferry, on the Potomac."

On suggestion of Mr. CLAY, Mr. PICKERING varied his motion so as to confine it to striking out the District of Columbia, leaving a blank to be filled as the House might think proper.

The motion, so varied, was decided in the affirmative by a large majority. So the District was put out of the question.

Mr. CLAY then moved to fill the blank in the section with the words "Pittsburg, at the junction of the Alleghany and Monongahela rivers."

This motion being under consideration, the Committee rose, and obtained leave to sit again.

WEDNESDAY, January 3.

Mr. SERGEANT presented a petition of Charles Stewart, late commander of the frigate Constitution, on behalf of himself, and the officers and crew of the said frigate, setting forth that, during the late war with Great Britain, he captured the British ship the Levant, and sent her into a port under the jurisdiction of the Government of Portugal, from whence she was forcibly retaken by the British forces; and praying that the value of said ship may be paid to himself, his officers, and men, as prize money.

Mr. INGHAM presented a petition of John McCaully, prize agent to the officers and crew of brig Syren, praying to be paid for a vessel captured by the said brig, during the late war with the Bey and Regency of Tripoli, which was afterwards taken into the Naval service of the United States.—Referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. TUCKER, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported a bill authorizing a subscription for an edition of such of the laws of the United States as relate exclusively to the District of Columbia; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. DESHA, the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures were instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing, by law, a port of entry at Maysville, in the State of Kentucky.

MONEY LOST BY A PURSER.

Mr. YANCEY, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of William F. Rodgers, which was read, and the resolution therein contained was concurred in by the House.

The report is as follows:

That the petitioner was purser of the United States ship Adams, which was destroyed at Penobscot to prevent her falling into the hands of the enemy; that the petitioner states that he was directed by the captain of the Adams, about the 20th August, 1814, to obtain from the navy agent at Portland, money to pay the crew, which he did to the amount of about $1,800; that, before he had an opportunity of paying the same over to the crew, the enemy appeared in great force on the river, and that he deemed it prudent and safe to deposit the money for safe-keeping with General Crosby, who was then acting as agent of the ship.

It appears to the committee, from the affidavit of General Crosby, that the petitioner, at the time of the attack on the Adams, handed to him a check on the Portland Bank for $800, and a bundle of paper money, which General Crosby did not count, but which the petitioner has since stated to him contained $1,000; that the check and bundle of money which were given to him were deposited in a small trunk; and that, on the near approach of the enemy, the General directed his little son to carry the trunk into the adjacent wood, and that he, being alarmed by the firing, dropped it and fled. The trunk was afterwards found, and was plundered, and one of the persons suspected of the plunder pursued and detected with the check and $400 in his possession. The petitioner states that he has been able to get only $200 of that and the check. He prays of Congress that an act may be passed, giving him a credit in his account with the United States of $800.

The committee are of opinion, from a full consideration of all the circumstances of this case, that the petitioner is not entitled to relief, and therefore recommend to the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be allowed.

Mr. YANCEY also reported a bill for the relief of George S. Wise, which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

MILITARY ACADEMIES.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for the establishment of Military Academies.

Mr. CLAY (Speaker) withdrew the motion he had yesterday made to place the only academy remaining on the bill at Pittsburg; and in lieu thereof moved to establish it at or near the mouth of Licking River on the Ohio, not as a point he preferred, because he thought better situations than that might be selected, but because the Committee on Military Affairs had originally decided in favor of that site. Mr. C. urged various arguments in favor of this location of the additional academy.

JANUARY, 1816.

Military Academies.

H. OF R.

The question on this motion was decided in the negative—68 to 58.

A motion of Mr. CANNON, to insert Nashville in the State of Tennessee, met with no better success, there being only about fifty votes in favor of it.

Mr. LEWIS then moved to insert in the blank Harper's Ferry, in the State of Virginia.

This motion was opposed at some length by Mr. WRIGHT, who preferred the original proposition to establish three additional Military Academies; but if only one were to be established, he would wish to see it established further South.

Mr. LEWIS's proposition met with no favor, there being but 15 or 16 votes in the affirmative.

Mr. BURNSIDE then moved to insert Carlisle, in the State of Pennsylvania.—This proposition received about the same number of votes as the last.

Mr. BARBOUR had preferred greatly the District of Columbia, if only one additional academy was to be established; but, as the House had departed from the District, he thought the position of the academy ought to be determined by geographical considerations, having reference to the one already established. Under the impression that this was a point which combined geographical with local advantages, he moved Abingdon, in the State of Virginia.

Mr. SHEFFEY, the Representative from that district, stated the precise bearings of Abingdon, and the advantages which recommend it to the attention of the House.

Mr. CANNON spoke in favor of Knoxville, in Tennessee, in preference to Abingdon; in which idea he was supported by Mr. WRIGHT.

Mr. BARBOUR having withdrawn his motion, to allow the question to be taken on Knoxville, there appeared to be in favor of that place 84 votes; against it 63.

So the House decided to insert Knoxville, in Tennessee.

Mr. WILDE then moved to strike out the whole of the first section, except the enacting clause, and in lieu thereof to insert a provision authorizing the establishment by the Executive of one or more Military Academies, not exceeding three, at such places as the President of the United States shall prescribe.

Mr. CALHOUN moved to amend the amendment by striking out the words one or more, and inserting three.—Negative.

After some debate, Mr. WILDE's motion was rejected by a large majority.

Mr. ROOR, after some prefatory observations and subsequent illustrations, founded on what he conceived the abuse of the benefits of these institutions, by their being diverted to the purposes of general education of their sons by those wealthy or influential men who gained their sons admission there, moved the following amendment to the bill:

"That no candidate for a cadet (except as herein-after provided) shall be admitted into any of the academies aforesaid, who shall not be under the age of twenty-one years, nor until after he shall have been examined by the said professors and teachers, or a majority of them, and found to be well versed in the Latin, Greek, French and Spanish languages; in history and geography, in the various branches of the mathematics, including trigonometry, geometry, and in moral, natural and experimental philosophy and astronomy, and shall then, with approbation in writing of his father, mother, or guardian, as the case may require, engage, by a regular engagement, to serve for the term of five years, unless sooner promoted or discharged; and in case he shall absent himself without leave, or be discharged for any other cause than lasting debility of body or mind, or in case of promotion shall refuse or neglect to accept thereof, or shall resign within three years thereafter, for any other cause than as above-mentioned, the father, mother, or guardian, as the case may require, shall forfeit and pay to the United States, the full amount of the pay and emoluments of such cadet, during his continuance at any of the said academies: Provided, nevertheless, That whenever it shall appear to the President that any young man, of natural abilities, is desirous of entering as a cadet into any of the said academies, and it shall be certified in writing, by his parent or guardian, that he or she is unable to educate his or her son or ward, and the verity of such certificate shall be satisfactorily established, it shall be lawful for the President to authorize his admission into any of the said academies, upon the terms heretofore in practice at the Military Academy at West Point; and provided, also, that any number of cadets above the age of fourteen, and under the age of twenty-one years, exceeding the number limited in and by this act, may be admitted into any of the said academies, and discharged on the request of their respective parents or guardians, on clothing and subsisting themselves, and without receiving pay or rations from the United States."

This amendment was negatived by a considerable majority.

The question being on the Committee's rising and reporting the bill as amended—

Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, said, that had he been satisfied with the course of this debate, or could have hoped for such a decision on this bill as he could acquiesce in, he should not have troubled the House with any observations thereon. Gentlemen appeared to take many things for granted on this occasion, which, for one, he was not disposed to concede; particularly the power of Congress to pass the bill in its present form, and the expediency of doing it. In what part of the Constitution do we find, said he, the power for establishing these academies, or indeed any seminaries of learning? But I pray you, sir, let me not be misunderstood upon this subject; let it not be supposed that I wish to close any door of information which it is possible for us to keep open. No, sir; but I could have wished that much of our treasure which has been wasted in useless objects, could have been devoted to the cause of science; but this power does not appear to have been delegated to us by the people. Their money is not to be bestowed by us on any individual, unless for services rendered. It may be supposed by many, that this bill is similar in its provisions to that establishing the present Military Academy at West Point; but they vary totally in principle and features. By the 26th section of that act which passed in March, 1802, soon after Mr. Jefferson came into office, and was for fixing the Military Peace Establishment, the President was authorized to organize a corps of engineers, to consist of one principal engineer, six assistant engineers, and ten cadets, with power of promotion—but at no time to exceed twenty officers and cadets; by the 27th section they were stationed at West Point, and were to constitute a Military Academy, but were subject, at all times to do duty in such places, and on such service as the President might direct. Thus they were, to every extent, a part of the Military Peace Establishment, and were organized as other troops are; not so the establishments contemplated by this bill; which goes to alter the present Establishment, and to convert the whole into seminaries of learning, and the cadets into students in the various arts and sciences—without any services to be rendered to the public for the expense which must be incurred in their education. And at the end of three or five years, they are thrown back upon society, with nothing but their swords to carve their way to fortune and to power. It is not consistent, sir, with the principles of our institutions, with the genius of our Republican Government, to form and cherish a body of this kind; mere soldiers of fortune. Gentlemen say that they are to be educated to form officers for our standing army, and for the militia. I thought, sir, at the last session, when you fixed your Military Establishment—your standing army in time of peace—at ten thousand men, three times the number of your Peace Establishment under WASHINGTON and ADAMS, and four thousand more than was first voted in this House—the principal argument in favor of so large an establishment was, that it would afford us a sufficient number of well instructed officers, should we again be involved in war. But, sir, how are these cadets to be incorporated as officers into your present Army? Do you intend they shall supersede the veteran officers of the line? Will that promote harmony in the ranks, or reward merit in your officers? Let them answer the question.

In what part of our Constitution then, sir, do we find our power to establish academies on the principle contemplated by this bill? I shall probably be pointed to our power “to raise and support armies.” But do these cadets form any portion of our Army? Is it even intended, were they capable, that they should do duty as soldiers? Not at all. Sir, I do not like this mode of legislating the people out of their rights and their property, by degrees; you first pass a law, organizing a corps of engineers and cadets, provide for their instruction, for an equivalent in duty and service to be rendered by them, and place them in a Military Academy; you now convert this Military Academy into a seminary of learning generally, take away the equivalent, and educate the young men who may be so fortunate as to gain admission there, at the public expense. If you can thus constitutionally educate eight hundred young men, why not eight thousand—why not, indeed, all the youth of the country?—there would, indeed, be some equality in this latter case, as all the people would then be equally benefited.

Granting, however, for the argument, that you have the power to pass this bill—where is the necessity or the expediency of doing it? As I before remarked, and as was on a former occasion contended by all those who now advocate this bill, will not your standing army of ten thousand men afford you officers sufficient—better instructed and accustomed to command? Nor, sir, is the expense of this establishment to be overlooked. Rid yourselves of the arrearages of the late war, before you make too many preparations for another. Revive public credit; replenish your Treasury; do justice to the Army and Navy, which have fought your battles, and preserved you in the hour of peril—as far, I mean, as the Government put it in their power to serve their country. Pay the veteran soldier and seaman, who have survived the storm of war, the pittance that is due to them. Pay their pensions to the maimed and halt, for the legs and arms which you have caused, by your war, to be severed from them; and, “if you can administer to a mind diseased,” comfort and bind up the broken hearts of the widow and fatherless.

But, sir, plausible as the reasons are which have been urged by some in favor of this bill, harmless as some of its features may appear, I am persuaded that what is thus shown to the public are only the ostensible purposes for which it is recommended. For the real purposes, we must go to the dark recesses of the palace, or the still more dark recesses of the mind of the President, or of his declared successor. We must go to the Message of the President at the opening of the session, for the origin and purpose of this bill. And I agree with my honorable friend from Massachusetts, (Mr. HULBERT,) that a good measure is not to be rejected because offered by a person whom we distrust; and when such a measure is offered, let it be by what hand it may, I will go as far as that honorable gentleman in support of it, if it has for its object the interest of the people or the welfare of our country. But confidence is said to be a plant of slow growth, and the honorable gentleman will pardon me, if I cannot go with him from the highest distrust of, to the greatest confidence in, the intentions and views of the present Chief Magistrate. Look at the tenth and eleventh pages of the Message. He there, first, recommends, as an improvement in our Military Establishment, the organization of a corps of invalids. A bill for this purpose has been acted upon by the House. Next an enlargement of the Military Academy, and the establishment of others in other sections of the Union. This is attempted by the present bill. He goes on: “And I cannot press too much on ‘the attention of Congress such a classification ‘and organization of the militia as will most effectually render it the safeguard of a free State.’ Free State, indeed! How long would any country remain free with the whole physical force thereof in the hands of the Chief Magistrate?

JANUARY, 1816.

H. OF R.

We well understand, sir, what this mild term classification means. It was urged upon us, pressed upon us, at the last session, in the odious form of a French conscription. Yes, sir; the sons of America, the hopes of their country and of their families, were to be torn from the arms of their parents and harnessed to the chariots of war. Yes, sir; this virtuous measure was, indeed, pressed upon us by the then Secretary of War, now Secretary of State, and heir apparent of the Presidency. "With this subject," says your President, "is intimately connected the necessity of accommodating the laws, in every respect, to the great object of enabling the political authority of the Union," (meaning himself,) "to employ promptly and effectually," (yes, without any control of the States,) "the physical power of the Union," (that is, the bayonets,) "in the cases designated by the Constitution;" that is, to execute conscription and embargo laws; to suppress insurrections which his own tyranny and oppression may have caused; and to repel invasions which his own rashness and folly, as in the late war, invited. Grant the power, by this short paragraph of the Message requested with so much earnestness, and elevate an ambitious blood-thirsty villain to the Presidency, and the liberties of this country would not survive a year of his Administration. And if the people, or their representatives, do grant this power, and thereby raise the sword to their throats, it is to be hoped that our then master would, in mercy, even end our miseries with our lives. But, sir, your President is not to have this power, though he seek it with tears; he has not made that correct use of the power which he now unfortunately possesses, that we should feel perfectly safe in surrendering our liberties into his hands.

But, sir, the real object of this bill is Executive patronage. Patronage is written in every feature of it. The President is not to organize this corps as other military corps are, but he is to appoint the eight hundred cadets. A fine opportunity to provide for the young fry of the Administration, the mere underbrush of the Government, and the royal cousins of the Palace. He, besure, had it in his power to provide for the old birds of the Administration, and, to do them justice, they have well feathered their nests, and their gaping, unfledged offspring will now be fed from the bill of the Government. Sir, this is not mere suspicion. This bill puts it in the power of the President to indulge the most odious favoritism, and, from what has been done on other occasions, there is no doubt this power will be abused. The honorable gentleman from the State of New York (Mr. Root) has proved that abuses have crept into the institution at West Point—that none but the sons of the rich and the powerful can gain admittance there. And the most odious partiality is manifested in some of the appointments in the Navy, particularly of midshipmen. Mere children, of the favored few, have been appointed, who never were on board a ship of war, and have nothing of the seaman about them except the anchor on their buttons; and this, too, to the exclusion of many brave and deserving sailors, masters, and mates, whom your restrictive acts drove from the merchants' employ. I know of many improper appointments of this kind; some in this very city. However, they belonged to the royal cousins. It is a shame, sir, that the brave Navy of this country should suffer by such gross partiality. Many, able and willing to serve on board our gallant Navy, dear to their friends and an ornament to their country, despairing of obtaining better service, have been compelled by the pressure of the war, to seek employ and support on board your private armed vessels; and in too many cases their lives have been a forfeit to their necessities. And, sir, what will be the consequences of these abusive appointments in your Navy? These boys, always thus thrown in at the cabin-windows, will, from the dates of their commissions as midshipmen, be preferred to the hardy seaman who has weathered many a gale at sea, escaped the perils of the ocean, and survived the shock of battle. This must not, nay, shall not be. The Navy is the darling of the people. They will protect it.

The friends of this bill have introduced many things into the debate which have no connexion with the subject. An honorable gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) whose intelligence and acuteness we often have occasion to admire, congratulates himself and the House on the expression of national feeling and patriotism, which he thinks he can discover in the country, and which he is pleased to ascribe to what he is pleased to call, the glory and success of the war. Glory and success of the war! Where in the name of God does he discover this glory and success? I have often read this language in party prints, devoted to the powers that are, and it may have been attended with success in taverns and grog-shops—not that I would insinuate that the honorable gentleman gains his intelligence from these corrupt sources—his spirit and independence are above them. I say, sir, this language may have issued from these corrupt sources, but I never expected to hear it on this floor. Where, let me ask the honorable gentleman, are we to look for this glory and success—where will foreign nations look for it? When you declared the late war; when this House published their far-famed manifesto, which I believe that honorable gentleman himself had a hand in composing, (and it was an honor to the head, whatever it might be to the heart that drew it,) you proclaimed to the world the wrongs and the insults you had suffered, and intimated that the sword you drew was not to be sheathed until they were redressed, and future aggressions provided against. Let me ask, then, sir, have you obtained a single object for which you drew the sword? Look at your declaration—your causes of war—and see if you find one of them provided for in your Treaty of Peace. Injuries which you declared must be redressed, or this would cease to be an independent nation—they are not only not provided for, but abandoned, surrendered, given up to your enemy. Sir, had this been a conquered country, our Ministers on their knees before their haughty conqueror, with his drawn sword at their throats, terms more humiliating could not have been dictated. You give up your sailors—ay, “free trade and sailors’ rights,” and all—give up definition of blockade—give up violated neutral rights, and leave a portion of your own country (Moose Island) in the possession of the enemy, till they shall be pleased to decide whether your own country does or not belong to you. Glory and success, indeed! But do not for a moment imagine, sir, that I would in the least detract from the well-earned fame of your gallant Navy, and certain individuals and corps of your Army; but this exclusively belongs to them. Sir, the more meritorious, as they were so miserably seconded by the Government. The very name of your Navy animates the patriot’s bosom. The constellation of her heroes shall “shine as the brightness of the firmament, and as the stars forever and ever.”

Sir, your Government is not yet identified with the Navy, nor the individuals of the Administration with those heroes who are encircled with glory. Will you, sir, attempt to strip the garland from the brow of a Hull, a Decatur, nay, all our gallant sailors, to decorate the prolific head of the miserable projector of contemptible gunboats; or tear by the roots, from a Ripley, a Scott, a Jackson, and a Brown, if you please, and their brave companions in arms, their well-earned laurels, to adorn the brows of the heroes of the ruined Capitol, or to transplant them in the barren fields of Bladensburg? Believe me, sir, their brows cannot bear the weight of such glory any more than the individuals can acquire it. Will such blasted fields yield the fruit of honor? Foreign nations, sir, and impartial posterity, will do justice to them all. This is not a subject of my calling up; it affords no pleasure to me to enumerate the faults of the Government, or the distress and disgrace of my country. It is the love I bear that country, interwoven as it is with every sensation of the heart, which makes me grieve for the misfortunes which the rashness and folly of her rulers by the late war have brought upon her; millions of treasure wasted, and thousands of lives of American citizens, each as valuable as that of your President, sacrificed, in a ruinous, unnecessary, and inexpedient war. Let the friends and promoters of that war, in future, maintain that humble silence thereon which its solemnity demands.

Mr. HULBERT said he begged the indulgence of the Committee a few minutes. He wished to reply to some observations which had fallen from his honorable colleague, (Mr. KING.)

He said he was surprised to hear the objection that Congress have no Constitutional right to establish Military Academies. He believed it was the first time the objection had ever been made. If, as his colleague contended, the establishment of Military Academies was unconstitutional, it was not a little surprising that no one had ever before made the discovery. Several laws in relation to the institution at West Point had been passed under Administrations of very different political character; but whatever might have been thought of the expediency of those laws, he was confident no one had ever questioned their constitutionality. The Constitution of the United States says, “Congress shall have power to raise and support armies.” This he thought a clear and ample authority to pass the bill before us. His honorable colleague had asserted that this was the first time the terms “Military Academy” had ever been used in our laws. This was a great mistake. If the gentleman had looked into the laws of 1802, he would have found the very terms which now appear to him so novel. His colleague had also asserted that the Military Academy formed no part of the Peace Establishment. Here he was equally erroneous. The corps of engineers constitutes the Academy at West Point, and that corps had been constantly preserved since its first organization, and the act of 1815, fixing the present Peace Establishment, expressly declares that that corps shall be retained. Mr. H. thought the point too plain to admit of a doubt.

The honorable gentleman had urged, as a very serious objection against this bill, that we had no money to spare for the proposed appropriation. Mr. H. said he knew that the Treasury had been drained, had been completely exhausted; but a deep and rapid current of revenue was now pouring into it, and he hoped it would soon be replenished. The sum proposed for the erection of three new academies was only two hundred thousand dollars, and even that sum could now be considerably lessened, as it had been determined to establish but one additional school. He hoped he was fully aware of the necessity and importance of economy; but it was not economy to refuse to give small sums of money for great and important benefits, and such he believed would be the fruits of this measure. His colleague would, he was confident, agree with him, that the age of calculators was as much to be dreaded as the age of spendthrifts.

My honorable colleague, continued Mr. HULBERT, says he strongly suspects that the real object of this bill is not disclosed. He fears that some mischief lurks behind the curtain. This may, he says, be a part of a plan of the present Administration to get the military power under their control, and thereby destroy the liberties of the country. Mr. H. said he belonged to the committee who reported this bill. He thought it a plain and simple proposition to enlarge the present establishment of the Military Academy. He saw in the measure none of those frightful evils so strongly apprehended by the gentleman. He hoped his honorable colleague would not be too much alarmed; would not be too suspicious. He said he had, when young, often been cautioned not to be looking out for bears; for they always appeared to those who expected to see them. This caution he recommended to the attention of his honorable colleague.

My colleague, said Mr. H., has strenuously urged that the appointment of so great a number of cadets, as is contemplated by the bill, would give to the President an improper and dangerous patronage. To whom would the gentleman give the power of appointment? Might it not be made a system of favoritism by any other man, or body of men, as well as by the President? The President has by the Constitution the power of appointing all officers of the Army, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. But since the Senate cannot with convenience be consulted on the selection of each cadet, why not give the authority to the President alone? Mr. H. said he was one of those who never believed that Executive patronage was too great in this country. He would rather see it increased than lessened. All grants of power might be abused, but that was not a sufficient argument against the grant. As to the story of children strutting in the dress of midshipmen, Mr. H. said he strongly suspected that his colleague here had seen another bear; that he had been deceived by some mock military exhibition of the school boys of this city, which he had himself sometimes seen here and elsewhere on holydays.

His honorable friend and others had contended that the number of cadets proposed was too great; that there would be more than could be commissioned by the Government. Mr. H. said it was not expected that all of the cadets would be employed as officers in time of peace. The very object of this military institution was to be prepared for war. Undoubtedly many of the cadets, after having finished their military education, would willingly return to their homes and engage in the pursuits of civil life. But in time of war, in the day of peril and danger, in the hour that should try men's souls, they would come forth at the call of their Government, and lead the hardy freemen of their country to victory and to glory. Let gentlemen calculate how many commissioned officers are employed in the present Peace Establishment, and then reflect that the time may come when we may have an army of sixty or a hundred thousand men to be officered, and surely they will not think the proposed number of cadets too large.

It had been said that the plan proposed for our adoption was calculated to excite a military spirit in our country, which would perpetually urge us to war with other nations, and might, in the end, destroy our own liberties. Were such, said Mr. H., the effects of that military spirit and military science so eminently displayed in our Revolutionary war? No; but directly the reverse. That spirit and that science gave us the very liberty and independence which we now enjoy.

Mr. H. said he had anxiously hoped that the distressing calamities, the defeat and foul disgrace which we had experienced in the beginning of the late war, had awakened the nation to a just sense of the importance of military science and preparation for a state of hostilities. Who did not shrink from such calamity and disgrace! He remembered them with shame and with horror. He had seen the face of the nation turn pale—the coldness of death had seized upon the extremities of the empire, and was creeping toward the heart—nay, it had reached the heart! It was to prevent the recurrence of such scenes, the repetition of such disasters, that he anxiously wished the passage of this bill.

To excite opposition to this bill, his colleague had poured forth a torrent of indignation against the late war. Mr. H. said no one more deeply lamented, nor more sincerely censured, the declaration of that war than he did. He considered it a rash and desperate measure. But the storm had passed over, and it was time to repair the ruins it had made. He had already declared, and he took this opportunity to repeat the declaration, that he esteemed the late message of the President as the harbinger of better times; the measures it recommended, and the spirit of conciliation it displayed, were worthy of the Chief Magistrate of a great and enlightened people. This, Mr. H. said, was one of the measures so recommended; and he would cheerfully give it his support, because he thought it calculated to promote the best interests and glory of his country.

Mr. JOHNSON said it had been his duty to address the House so frequently on this interesting subject, that it was with reluctance that he now had to answer some remarks which had fallen from two gentlemen from Massachusetts, (Messrs. KING and HULBERT.) He had been very much pleased with the greater part of the observations of the gentleman last up, (Mr. HULBERT.) He said he reciprocated many sentiments which had been expressed, many he admired, and many had a direct tendency to enlighten; in fact, strong evidence had been given of a liberal support of the bill, and enlarged views of the beneficial results of military instruction. The same magnanimous course might have induced an omission of expressions calculated to excite party feelings and recrimination. He said he had indulged in a hope that the observations of yesterday would have been verified, viz: that nationality of sentiment prevailed in this House, and that on this occasion there would be an amalgamation of feeling and a union of sentiment; but the strong language of the gentleman to-day had lessened that hope, for the gentleman is pleased to say that he holds in the greatest abhorrence and detestation the declaration of war against Great Britain; and Mr. J. said he must declare with equal sincerity that he recollected with equal abhorrence and detestation the violent opposition to that war, and that disaffection to the Constitution which prevailed in many parts of the United States, and in none to a more criminal extent than that in which the gentleman resided. It cannot be denied that the want of a proper system of military instruction previous to the war, as proposed by this system, was the cause of some of our difficulties, and this argument in favor of the bill is entitled to consideration; but disunion was the chief cause of those calamities and disasters which afflicted the nation, and to which the gentleman alludes. No necessity existed, if time allowed, to bring to the recollection of the House the example of Spain in her resistance of imperial France, and the example of France in submitting to the invasion of the allies. The history of the United States would furnish memorable examples of the glorious achievements of a manly, vigorous, and united resistance, and the evils of faction and a division of sentiment which relied upon the magnanimity of a most implacable enemy; it was this mean, submitting spirit, united to an incessant opposition to the Administration, the object of which was power, that the most of the disasters and evils of the war may be attributed; these facts cannot be disguised, they are known to the people, and they think accordingly. This was not a proper occasion to detain the House upon the subject of the war, but as great anxiety had been manifested to invite a discussion of that subject, whenever the proper time should arrive, it would not be improper to examine the conduct and merit of those who declared the war and supported it, and those who opposed it and made use of every exertion in the councils of the nation, and out of it, to prevent a glorious termination of the war. Such inquiry may be useful in affording the people a better opportunity in the hour of calm reflection to decide the merit of the two parties in the nation. But the same gentleman had made use of another expression which deserved notice, viz: that at a certain period of the war good men of all parties looked pale, and in fact the sleep of death had seized the extremities of the nation. It is not denied that this remark may apply to that part of the Union which that gentleman represents; he may have seen and felt this gripe of death, and this may have been the efficient cause why the arm of the Government was so feeble in that quarter as to prevent the hardy yeomanry of Maine from driving the enemy from Castine. But Mr. J. said he hoped he should be excused in stating that no such alarm existed in the West; no pale faces were seen, nor did the gripe of death seize that part of the Union. The people felt indignant, but no alarm nor disappointment at the savage and barbarous conduct of the enemy; those who lived during the Revolution, or had read its history, expected such conduct from Great Britain as soon as war was declared; but this consideration could have no other effect than to unite the friends of liberty and those who loved their country. The declaration of war involved many calamities; this was known to every reflecting mind, and the patriot considered these a lesser evil than further submission to foreign encroachment. The murder of the wounded soldier, the profanation of the temples of religion, and the destruction of many villages, only proved the greater necessity there was to oppose that nation which threatened our existence as an independent Government. On most occasions, Mr. J. said, the other gentleman (Mr. KING) had indulged in ascribing hidden and ambitious views to the President of the United States. It was not necessary to account for such deadly hostility or personal hatred to a man whose public services had identified him with every wise measure of the Government for upwards of thirty years, whose talents had always been the pride of his country, whose integrity could not be impeached, and whose moral character had gained the veneration and respect of all who knew him well; but it may be necessary to say, that on this occasion motives and hidden views had been most unnecessarily brought forward against the committee, and also against the President who had publicly recommended this measure. Mr. J. said he was convinced that no gentleman, upon reflection, who felt the strength of virtue in his own bosom, could indulge in—[Here Mr. KING explained, and Mr. J. declined to say anything more.]

The Committee then rose and reported the bill.

The question being on the number of cadets to be attached to the Military Academy or Corps of Engineers—

Mr. PICKERING opposed the number of eight hundred, which was proposed by the Military Committee.

Mr. FORSYTH was opposed to a reduction of the number. He was in favor of making such preparations as if we calculated on the recurrence of war. Was it not known, he asked, that the nation with whom we were lately at war—with whom we should, in all probability, before very long be again at war—was strengthening its frontier by repairing its old fortifications and building new ones? Was it not known that that nation had more than fourteen thousand regular troops on the frontier? What could be the object of this preparation? It might be merely defensive; he hoped it was so. Believing it to be the intention of the Government of this nation to preserve peace, he trusted we should have it in our power. But the object of the British Government may be different, and these preparations may have an offensive object. Our motions should be regulated by theirs; and, if the nature of our institutions forbids a large Military Establishment, preparations should be made in another way. On all hands it was admitted that the measure proposed by this bill, was the most efficient practical mode of adding to our military strength; and he hoped the bill would not be limited in its scope to a smaller number than was proposed. In reply to the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the youth educated at the academy would be fit for nothing but the military service of the country, he said, they would be as well fitted for entering into the walks of civil life, as those who had been educated in a different manner—and gentlemen could not seriously imagine any danger from turning out into the community two or three hundred well educated young men. As their services might be necessary for military purposes, and the knowledge they acquire would not in any event be lost to the country, he hoped the number would not be diminished.

Mr. CALHOUN also opposed the reduction of the number of cadets; because, if the present number were retained, it would afford ample room for a proper selection of officers. In another point of view, he thought it materially necessary to retain the proposed number. The whole population of the United States is composed of men, active, vigorous, and spirited. With good officers to lead them, you may at any time make out of any portion of them active, good soldiers. What is requisite to make our militia efficient? Military knowledge, only, said Mr. C. The cadets will many of them return to the body of the people, and become a part of the militia. Suppose a renewal of the struggle between us and the nation with whom we were recently at war; suppose she should put forth her whole strength to crush this young country; we shall then find the use of having men qualified to lead our citizens to meet her invading foe. The whole population of the country becomes an efficient force, because it has among it men properly educated and qualified to lead an army into the field. Every citizen of a free country, and of course of this country, said Mr. C., has two duties to perform; the duty of defending his country by arms if necessary, and the duty of voting, and thus participating in the management of the affairs of his country. Every young man of ardent feeling will desire to qualify himself for their proper performance. These are duties which every citizen ought zealously to perform, and from which, if the people ever shrink, our nation will not long have existence. Mr. C. appealed to the history of Republics, which had so often lost their liberties from the indisposition of the citizens to perform their share of military duty. It ought to be the object of a wise Government to resist a tendency towards apathy in the people; to diffuse military science. The dependence on regular force merely was a contracted idea, which he hoped this House would not give into. The Army, Mr. C. said, was, and ought always to be, a respectable part of the military force of the nation; but a well organized Militia is its bulwark—and they are but a rabble without discipline. Hence the necessity for the free diffusion of military science. He hoped, therefore, the largest number of cadets proposed to be authorized, would be agreed to.

The amendments, which go to limit the additional academies to one, to be established at Knoxville, Tennessee, were agreed to without a division.

Mr. TAYLOR then moved an amendment, directing that the cadets should be admitted into the academies, from the several States and Territories, in numbers proportionate to the militia returns thereof, and that the Secretary of War should make an annual return of the names and residence of the cadets at these academies, the time of their admission, and their respective places of residence.

The motion was agreed to.

Some diversity of opinion, and some animated debate, took place on the number of cadets to be authorized by the bill. It ended in a motion, by Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, to strike out eight hundred, the number proposed by the bill, so as to leave it blank, to be filled according as a majority might then decide. For this motion, there were 79 votes; against it, 55. So the motion was carried.

The question being taken on filling the blank with six hundred, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 77.

Mr. ROOT then moved to amend the bill, so as to extend the period of encampment required by this bill from six weeks to three months; which, after debate, was negatived.

After the rejection of a proposition, by Mr. PICKERING, to amend the bill so as to bind the cadets more certainly to the military service, after having been educated in the academy—

On motion of Mr. HULBERT, the bill was re-committed to the Military Committee, to adjust its details to the principles already decided on.

ESTIMATE OF EXPENSES.

THURSDAY, January 4.

Mr. BAYLIES presented a petition of the manufacturers of cotton goods, in the county of Plymouth, in the State of Massachusetts, praying that such measures may be adopted as will afford security and encouragement to the cotton manufacturing within the United States.—Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. LEWIS presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the county of Alexandria, praying that a court-house, a jail, and sundry public offices, for the use of the county of Alexandria, may be erected at the expense of the General Government.

Mr. L. also presented a petition of the Mechanic Relief Society of Alexandria, praying that they may be authorized, by lottery, to raise money for the purpose of erecting a school-house for the education of the children of the mechanics of said town.

Mr. L. also presented a petition of the Trustees of the Alexandria Academy, praying that the banks in Alexandria, who have applied, or may hereafter apply, for charters, or extension of charters, may be compelled to subscribe ten thousand dollars each in the stock of said academy.—Referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. CLARK, of Kentucky, presented a petition of the Kentucky Abolition Society, praying that a tract of vacant and unappropriated lands may be set apart for the residence of free negroes and mulattoes, and that they may be transported to the said lands at the public expense.—Referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill for the relief of Martin Cole, John Pollock, George Westner, and Abraham Welty; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time tomorrow.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, reported a bill for the relief of John Redman Coxé; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CANNON, from the committee appointed on the 14th ultimo, reported a bill to provide for the widows and orphans of the officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, of the volunteers and militia, who have been killed in battle, died in service, or of wounds received while in the service of the United States during the late war; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "for the relief of Joseph Anderson," in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The bill was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting statements of the expenditure and application of such sums as have been drawn from the Treasury for the Military Department, from the 1st of October, 1814, to the 30th of September, 1815, which were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

On motion of Mr. EASTON, the Committee on the Public Lands were instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for the establishment of a land office, for the sale of the public lands, at the town of Arkansas, in the county of Arkansas; and a land office at the town of Jackson, in the county of Cape Girardeau, in the Territory of Missouri.

On motion of Mr. STANFORD, the Committee of the Whole were discharged from a further consideration of the report of the committee appointed to revise the rules and orders; and it was recommended to Messrs. STANFORD, BASSETT, SERGEANT, GOLD, DESHA, and TELFAIR.

Mr. PLEASANTS, in offering the following motion, remarked, that he had no wish to produce any sensation in the House, nor to agitate, at present, any question relating to the unfortunate affair of Dartmoor prison, but he was desirous to be placed in possession of any official documents in relation to it which may be in the hands of the Executive department; with that view, he moved—

"That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this House, if in his opinion it will not be inconsistent with the public welfare, any communications which may have passed between this Government and the Government of Great Britain, in relation to the transactions at Dartmoor prison, in the month of April last, so far as the American prisoners of war, there confined, were affected by them."

On the suggestion of Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, that there might be documents in the possession of the Government, relating to this subject, not connected with the correspondence with the British Government, the resolution was modified so as to embrace such documents; and, thus modified, the motion was agreed to, and a committee ordered to be appointed to lay the same before the President.

The bill for the relief of Henry Fanning, and the bill for the relief of William Morrisett, passed through Committees of the Whole, and were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

SETTLERS ON THE PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. JENNINGS rose and observed, that he wished to call the attention of the House to a subject growing out of a late proclamation of the President of the United States, ordering all settlers on the public lands to be removed after an early day in March next. By an act of Congress, dated the 3d of March, 1807, the President of the United States was authorized so to do; but, by the second section of the same act, a provision was made, that any such settlers who were actually settled on the public lands prior to the passage of that act, might continue to reside thereon; provided such settlers should, prior to the 1st of January, 1808, apply to the proper officers of the land offices, and obtain a permission to reside thereon, conditioned to deliver up possession whenever required by a purchaser of the United States, and conditioned, likewise, to commit no waste or damages while residing thereon.

Mr. J. observed, that he was not personally acquainted with the views of the Congress of the United States, in passing the act referred to, but, if he was correctly informed, the object was to bear materially on the settlers who had settled on the disputed tract of country, commonly called the Yazoo purchase, although the act has a general operation. Those persons who had settled on the public land, lying within the Territory of Indiana, before the war, had sat down on the lands last purchased of the Indians, and remained there, and still remain. These persons, said Mr. J., have suffered greatly by their exposed situation to the attacks of the savages, and have been of great advantage in defending the frontier during the late hostility of the Northwest Indians. They, or a very great portion of them, he said, were now prepared with money to purchase so soon as those lands shall be exposed to sale by the Government. By these persons the operation of the proclamation will be severely felt, indeed; inasmuch as the sales of those lands will not, probably, take place before May next, and those settlers, in the mean time, must leave their homes and firesides, only to seek a residence for a few months. He thought it extremely hard now to remove them after they had been suffered to remain undisturbed before and during the war; whereas, if they were permitted to remain a few months longer, the sales of those lands would, in a great degree, render the measure unnecessary, and greatly limit the unpleasant effects which its execution will certainly produce. He therefore submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of extending, by law, to all settlers on the public lands of the United States, who have settled thereon since the 1st day of January, 1808, the same privilege extended to such settlers prior to that day, by the second section of the act of Congress, passed March 3, 1807.

The resolution was agreed to without debate, by a majority of twenty or thirty votes.

SYSTEM OF BANKRUPTCY.

Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, offered for consideration the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the situation of the unfortunate merchants and traders, reduced, by misfortunes and circumstances beyond their control, from competence to want, now demand that Congress should exercise the power vested in them by the people for the relief of the unfortunate debtor, by the establishment of a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to prepare and report a bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

Mr. K. said, that as a bill on this subject would require much labor in perfecting its details, he thought it would not be worth while to put this burden on any committee, unless the House should show a disposition to adopt the principle. He had, therefore, thrown his motion into an imperative form. The power to establish such a system was expressly given in the Constitution, and, being given, Mr. K. contended, was not intended by the framers of the Constitution to lie dormant there, but to be exercised for the benefit of the people. Mr. K. cited, as evidence of the popular sentiment on this head, the acts of the Legislatures of several of the States on the subject, some of which had been declared by the judges unconstitutional, inasmuch as the Constitution had expressly given the power to the General Government. This was a strong reason why Congress ought to act on the subject. Mr. K. called the attention of the House to the situation of the merchants, whose fortunes had for some years been as fluctuating as the waves; and to the operation on the mercantile community of the restrictive system, of so little importance against an enemy, and so cruel an operation to them. Every motive, in short, which ought to actuate legislators or gentlemen, Mr. K. remarked, ought to induce the House to grant the relief desired to the suffering merchant and tradesman.

Mr. WRIGHT, in a few observations on this subject, denied the right of State judges to decide against the validity of insolvent laws, passed by the States.

Mr. THROOP moved that the resolution be laid on the table, and be ordered to be printed.

Mr. JACKSON required a division of the question on this motion.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, expressed his views on this subject, which were, substantially, that he was willing, and he presumed there would be no objection to vote for an inquiry into this subject; though he was unwilling, without investigation, to decide in favor of a general bankruptcy law. He thought if the proposition were for an inquiry into the subject merely, that there would be no objection to it.

Mr. KING then withdrew his motion, with a view to accommodate the wishes of gentlemen friendly to the object, and, in lieu thereof, substituted the following:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing an uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

This proposition was agreed to without a division.

COMMERCE WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to carry into effect the stipulations of the Treaty of Commerce, lately concluded with Great Britain. The first section of the bill having been read—

Mr. FORSYTH (the chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations) stated the general object of the bill, and the nature of its provisions. The bill, he said, was intended to carry into effect those parts of the treaty which require legislative interposition; which he enumerated, and compared the provisions of the bill in this respect, with the provisions of the treaty. He then stated to the House the present discriminating duties on tonnage and on importation, and showed that the bill went to conform them to the provisions of the treaty, and placed British merchants in that respect on the same footing with ours. He next adverted to the British tariff, and showed the British discriminating duties, and the great advantages which would be derived to the United States by their abolition, in pursuance of the treaty, &c.

Two or three amendments to the bill were then moved by Mr. F., and agreed to, one of which went to give this act a retrospective effect, and to make its provisions take effect from the date of the ratification of the treaty; and another to confine the repeal of our discriminating duty to goods coming directly from the territories of Great Britain in Europe.

Mr. CLAY (Speaker) said, he did not rise on this occasion to enter into a discussion of the general merits of the instrument brought incidentally before the House by the present bill, particularly as there appeared to be no wish on any side of the House to enter on that subject. He rose to make some explanations relative to the third article, which perhaps might not be considered unnecessary. It would be perceived, he said, that the third article of the convention, which opens the trade to the British East Indies, restricted us to certain enumerated ports. This was a restriction not contained in the Treaty of 1794, nor in that negotiated by Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney, commonly called the rejected treaty. The reason was, that upon the expiration of the charter of the East India Company, which took place three or four years ago, the question so long agitated in Great Britain had again come up, whether the monopoly of the trade to India should remain with the company, as it had done. On that occasion, it had been thought proper by the British Government to deviate to a certain extent from its former policy, and open the trade to British subjects, generally, under some restrictions. By the act which then passed, the British subjects were limited to these specified ports; and it had been thought right by Great Britain, especially as it was in her opinion a grant to us without an equivalent, to limit our citizens to the same ports. That act of Parliament, Mr. C. said, was a new era in the trade to British India; and it was impossible to estimate the value of the concession to us, without taking into consideration that important change. When the trade was wholly in the hands of the company, they had been found incompetent to supply India with the specie necessary for circulation; and the trade had been opened to us, and other foreign Powers, to make up the deficit. Now that British subjects were let into the trade, it remained to be ascertained by experience whether they could not furnish the requisite supply of specie without the aid of foreigners. If they could, the opening of the trade to foreign Powers operates as an advantage in their favor, and to the prejudice of the British merchant, to the whole amount of the profits derived by such foreign Powers. These suggestions, Mr. C. said, he had thought proper to make to the Committee, inasmuch as some gentlemen might not have adverted to the change of the laws by which that trade was regulated.

Mr. GASTON said, that believing the convention, since its ratification in due form, had become a law of the land, and unable to perceive wherein it needed the help of an act of Congress to give it operation, he had viewed the bill before the Committee as nugatory and unmeaning. Although he had thought it strange that gentlemen who had abjured so many of the errors of their predecessors, should thus, by construction, retain and perhaps extend a most inconvenient error in regard to the effect of treaties, he was willing, without interruption on his part, to indulge them in their course. But regarding himself as having no agency in relation to this convention, he had not entertained the most remote thought of examining into its merits or demerits. He was induced, however, to say a word in relation to the third article of the convention, in consequence of the observations made on it by the honorable Speaker. This gentleman had stated, with a view to form an estimate of the value of the limited East India trade therein conceded, as compared with the more general grant on the same subject in the Treaty of Mr. Jay, that, subsequent to the date of that treaty, Great Britain had opened this trade to her own subjects, not of the East India Company, and therefore needed not so much the assistance of foreign merchants to bring supplies of bullion. If this formed an item for raising the value of the concession, it was proper to state another fact which would go to the opposite side of the account, and serve to adjust the balance. Since Mr. Jay's Treaty, (he believed in 1797,) the British Parliament had opened this same trade to the subjects of all friendly foreign Powers, and to this day without treaty it remained open to them all; the fact was, that the British East India possessions were valuable more for revenue than commerce. This revenue required a free importation of bullion from whatever quarter it could be had, and a free exportation of their commodities to foreign countries; it was, besides, desirable that this exportation should be made to distant regions, where they were not likely to come into direct competition with the manufactures of the parent kingdom.

Whether the East India trade was at all desirable to this country, was a question on which enlightened statesmen greatly differed; our table was groaning under the weight of petitions for prohibiting the great mass of importations from that quarter, and there had been a long and loud complaint against the perpetual drain of specie to it. However this might be, it was very certain that the only concession made by the third article was of a trade already open to us by a general law, and which was so desirable to them that they might find it their interest to pay us a bounty not to abandon it. Great Britain and her rulers well understood the spirit of traffic, and we might rely on it they had not in this instance given us a "quid" without a "quo" in return for it.

Mr. CLAY said, that the gentleman from North Carolina and himself were at issue on the fact. Mr. C. denied that the trade to the British East Indies was open to us by act of Parliament. By the regulations of the local authority of those countries, the trade might be open to us; but the difference between such regulations and the stipulations of a treaty was, that if there were any value in the trade to the British East India possessions, the treaty stipulation prevents us from being deprived of it by a repeal of those regulations during the continuance of the treaty. The benefit of the trade itself was another question; if not beneficial, the treaty did not force it on us. Mr. C. added, that he was not disposed to enter into a discussion of the treaty-making power. It might be sufficient for him to say that, at the worst, according to the opinions of gentlemen on the other side, the act would be harmless; whilst, in the opinion of gentlemen on this side, it was entirely necessary.

Mr. GASTON rejoined a few words, rather in acquiescence in the idea of this bill being harmless. As to the East India trade, he said, it was not to be presumed that the trade which the Government of Great Britain held out to every foreign Power without an equivalent, could itself be of any great use. As to the stipulation on this head, in the treaty, supposed to be so favorable to us, Mr. G. said, that Great Britain was not in the habit of giving advantages without equivalents.

[In reply to a previous remark of Mr. GASTON, that it was entirely an error to suppose a law necessary to give effect to a treaty, which, being the supreme law of the land, is paramount to existing laws—]

Mr. FORSYTH said, he had no disposition to enter into the discussion of this question; but it might be necessary that he should say, that the passage of this bill was not merely harmless but indispensable; because the power of legislation was vested in Congress, and could be exercised by no other authority. This doctrine was not only correct and Constitutional, but had been acted on by all Administrations and in all times. The provisions of the treaty being general, it was, independent of the general question of the effect of a treaty on existing laws, necessary to declare in what manner the act should be carried into effect.

Some further observations passed on this subject between Mr. GASTON and Mr. FORSYTH, which were afterwards more amply stated by them in debate.

The Committee having risen, and reported the bill and amendments, an objection was made by Mr. MILNOR to an amendment going to limit the operation in the bill to British vessels coming directly from the British territories in Europe. On this question, some debate took place—Mr. FORSYTH contending, though he considered the amendment as of no great importance, that it was according to the letter and spirit of the treaty.

On motion of Mr. MILNOR, the House adjourned without deciding this question.

FRIDAY, January 5.

Mr. WHEATON presented a petition of a committee of sundry manufacturers of cotton goods, in Bristol county, in Massachusetts, praying that all cotton goods, (nankeens excepted,) imported from places beyond the Cape of Good Hope, may be prohibited, and that additional duties may be imposed on goods of that description imported from other countries.—Referred.

Mr. SOUTHARD presented a similar petition from the manufacturers of cotton goods in Somerset county, New Jersey.—Referred.

Mr. SERGEANT presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of Philadelphia, praying that the several acts imposing duties on domestic manufacturers may be repealed.

Mr. SERGEANT also presented a petition of the goldsmiths, silversmiths, and jewellers, of the city of Philadelphia, praying that the act imposing duties on gold and silver plate and jewelry may be repealed.

Mr. SHARPE presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of Barren county, in the State of Kentucky, praying that the act imposing duties on domestic manufactures may be repealed, and that the duty on spirits may also be repealed.

Mr. ROBERTSON presented a petition of the sugar planters, in the State of Louisiana, praying that the duties laid during the late war with Great Britain, on foreign sugar, rum, and molasses, may be made permanent.—Referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. PICKERING, from the committee appointed on the 12th ultimo, reported resolutions requiring the Secretary of State to compile and print, once in every two years, a register of all officers and agents, civil, military, and naval, in the service of the United States; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Tuesday next.

On motion, of Mr. EASTON, the Committee on Military Affairs were instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for the printing and distribution among the militia officers of the several States and Territories, a suitable number of copies of the militia laws of the United States, the rules and articles of war, and the discipline adopted by the United States.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act for the relief of William Morrisett," was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Henry Fanning," was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Martin Cole, John Pollock, George Westner, and Abraham Welty," was read the third time, and passed.

The bill for the relief of George S. Wise, and the bill to authorize the discharge of James Jewett from his imprisonment, were ordered to a third reading.

The bill authorizing the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed in the service of the United States, during the war, was, on motion of Mr. FORSYTH, postponed to Friday next.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, transmitting the report of the land commissioner for the district east of Pearl river; and the report of James D. Cooley, commissioner for the district west of Pearl river.

VESSEL LOST IN FLOTILLA SERVICE.

Mr. YANCEY, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of William O'Neale and Robert Taylor, which was read, and the resolution therein contained was concurred in by the House. The report is as follows:

That the petitioners are owners of the schooner Islet, which, in the month of June, 1814, then lying in the river Patuxent, they chartered to the United States as a store-ship to the flotilla commanded by Commodore Barney, upon the following terms: The petitioners were to find a sufficient number of seamen to navigate the vessel, the captain of the vessel to be under the orders of the commander of the flotilla, to carry such quantity of naval stores as was agreed on, and her safety, in every respect, to be at the risk of the owners; for which services and risk the United States agreed to give to the petitioners the sum of ten dollars per day; that, on the approach of the enemy, in August, 1814, it was deemed prudent by the commanding officer of the flotilla to blow it up, to prevent its falling into the hands of the enemy, but the schooner Islet, which was left to the care and management of Captain Taylor, one of the petitioners, was run up the river and sunk by him, to prevent the vessel and stores from falling into the hands of the enemy; the vessel has not been raised. The petitioners pray of Congress a compensation equal to the value of the vessel, and such further relief as may be just.

The committee are of opinion that the petitioners, having undertaken in their contract to be at all risks of the vessel, and the vessel having been sunk by its commander, who is one of the petitioners, are entitled to no relief.

They therefore recommend to the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioners ought not to be granted.

ADMISSION OF INDIANA.

Mr. JENNINGS, from the committee appointed on the 28th ultimo, on the petition of the Legislature of the Territory of Indiana, made a detailed report, which was read; when, Mr. J. reported a bill to enable the people of the Indiana Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

The report is as follows:

That the said Territory is bounded on the east by the State of Ohio; on the south by the State of Kentucky; on the west by the river Wabash, from its mouth to a point opposite the town of Vincennes, and from thence by a due north line until it intersects a due east and west line which shall touch the southern extreme of Lake Michigan; and on the north by the line last described; that the said Territory is a portion of the Territory northwest of the river Ohio, which, by the ordinance for the government thereof, was ordained to constitute not less than three nor more than five States; that the ordinance aforesaid, whenever the Territory of Indiana shall possess sixty thousand free inhabitants, guarantees to those inhabitants the benefit of being admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States; that the ordinance aforesaid not having declared under what authority the population of the said Territory should be ascertained, to complete their title to an admission into the Union, the Legislature thereof, after having, by actual census, ascertained that the Territory of Indiana possesses a population of upwards of sixty thousand free inhabitants, have deemed it the most prudent and respectful to submit to Congress the result of that census, and ask the passage of a law to enable the people of said Territory to form a constitution and State government.

Your committee, believing the said Territory to possess a population of sixty thousand free inhabitants, at least, deem it unnecessary to offer any further reasons in support of the expediency of granting the principal prayer of the memorialists; and therefore beg leave to report a bill to enable the people of the Territory of Indiana to form a constitution and State government, on conditions not less advantageous and similar to those heretofore granted to other Territories of the United States.

CORRIGAN, February 24, 1816.

Uniformity of Elections—Commerce with Great Britain.

H. OF R.

I, William Hendricks, Clerk of the House of Representatives, do hereby certify that the within statement is correct. Given under my hand the day above written.

W. HENDRICKS, Clerk of the House of Representatives.

UNIFORMITY OF ELECTION.

Mr. PROCKENS, of North Carolina, rose to make a motion on a subject which he had for some time considered of great importance to the national interest. Although he had heretofore in vain pressed it on the consideration of the House, he thought the change of the circumstances of the nation, and the harmonious relations of political parties, at present, justified the hope that he should now meet with better success. The proposition he was about to submit had at different times been supported by the unanimous vote of both branches of the Legislature of North Carolina; and under the sanction of this respectable authority, he thought it his duty again to offer it to the consideration of the House, which he did in the following shape:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, two thirds of both Houses concurring therein, That the following amendment to the Constitution of the United States, be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, which, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the said States, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the said Constitution.

For the purpose of choosing Representatives in the Congress of the United States, each State shall be divided, by its Legislature, into a number of districts equal to the number of Representatives to which the State may be entitled.

Each district shall contain, as nearly as may be, equal numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three fifths of all other persons.

In each district the qualified voters shall elect one Representative.

For the purpose of choosing Electors of President and Vice President of the United States, each State shall be districted, by its Legislature, into a number of districts equal to the number of Electors to which the State may be entitled. Each district shall contain, as nearly as may be, equal numbers; which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to serve for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all other persons. In each district the persons qualified to vote for Representatives in the Congress of the United States, shall choose one Elector; the Legislature of each State shall have power to regulate the manner of holding elections, and making returns of the Electors chosen. In case all the Electors shall not meet at the time and place appointed for giving their votes, a majority of the Electors met shall have power, and proceed to supply the vacancy.

A division of the States into districts, for choosing Representatives in the Congress of the United States, and into districts for choosing Electors of President and Vice President of the United States, shall take place as soon as conveniently may be, after each enumeration and apportionment of Representatives shall be made, which districts shall remain unaltered, until after the succeeding enumeration and apportionment of Representatives.

The resolution was twice read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

COMMERCE WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole on the bill carrying into effect the commercial convention with Great Britain.

The question being on the agreement to the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FORSYTH defended the amendment. He was of opinion that that construction and no other ought to be put on the treaty, which was embraced by the amendment. In the construction of any part of an instrument, reference must be made to its object. The whole object of the treaty was, to regulate the direct commerce between the United States and the territories of Great Britain in Europe. The exception in respect to the East India trade proved the rule, and excluded the idea of other exceptions. The correctness of this construction, he said, was further evinced by the correspondence between our Ministers and the British negotiators, &c., as he proceeded to show, by reference to the published correspondence, &c.

Mr. ROBERTSON, after remarking that no inference could be drawn from papers not before the House, (as the correspondence of our Ministers was not,) proceeded to observe, that he could not see the necessity of the amendment. It did not belong to the treaty, any more than to the interests of the United States. That treaty gave privileges, of which this amendment, if adopted, would deprive us. The amendment went to cut off a trade which it is of importance to us to preserve. The terms of the instrument to be carried into effect by the bill, did not, as far as he could understand, authorize the construction that British vessels, coming from other than British ports, are to be subject to higher duties than if they came direct from a port of Great Britain. The terms of the treaty and the interests of commerce equally forbade such a construction. Appreciating the capability and enterprise of this as a navigating and ship-building people, he was perfectly ready to enter the lists with any or all commercial nations, on the fair and liberal principles belonging to commerce, unaffected by commercial restrictions. He desired no more, in this respect, than that we should be placed on an equal footing with other Powers, not doubting but we should gain profit from the competition. He referred to the act of the last Congress, hypothetically repealing the discriminating duties, as evidence of the intention of Congress to hold out an invitation to all nations to do away their discriminating duties, on a pledge that we would do the same. The treaty, he said, was merely an echo of the principles of that law. Then why should not the most liberal interpretation be given to the treaty? He could, he said, readily conceive that a-commerce carried on circuitously by Great Britain, under such a construction, would be of but little importance to her, because of the relative situation of her and our ports. But there were many cases occurring in the course of commercial transactions, when the privilege would be highly advantageous to us, as in the case of clearing out to one port, and desiring to seek further for a market, &c., a case daily occurring. For the construction of a treaty we ought to resort nowhere but to the instrument itself; and he did not think the amendment could be supported on it.

Mr. TUCKER said, that he feared he should incur the imputation of presumption, in venturing upon a discussion involving commercial considerations, with which he could not pretend to be familiar. Convinced, however, of the impropriety of such of the amendments reported by the Committee of the whole House, as had a tendency to discriminate between the direct and indirect trade with the British dominions in Europe, he rose very respectfully to suggest to his friend, at the head of the Committee of Foreign Affairs, the propriety of waiving those amendments; and, at the same time, to offer to the House the reasons which had induced such a suggestion.

It appears to me, continued Mr. T., that in legislating on this convention, we should confine ourselves to the terms of the instrument itself, without attempting, by any superadded phraseology, to give it a construction which we may suppose it will bear. The terms of the law ought strictly to correspond with those of the treaty, lest by departing from it we should hazard a breach of faith, the imputation of which we should be solicitous to avoid. Whether we regard the convention as so plain as not to be susceptible of a twofold meaning, or not, it is equally evident that it would be unwise to depart from its phraseology in framing the act under consideration. For, if it be not susceptible of more than one meaning, why shall we attempt to explain what requires no explanation? If, on the contrary, it does admit of a double construction, what right have we, as one of the contracting parties, to pronounce upon the true interpretation of the instrument, which may not equally be claimed by the other party to the convention? By such a course of proceeding, the treaty itself would be the source of most serious collisions. But if, on the contrary, we should pass this act in the terms of the treaty, and leave to the Executives of the two nations to settle and adjust any ambiguity it may contain, no evil can ensue. If it be attempted, in the two countries, to settle the meaning of the instrument by legislative provision, it is probable the parties will soon be at issue, as no means can be devised for mutual explanations between them, in a legislative character. But, if the adjustment be left with the Executive, such mutual explanations can and will take place, and every unpleasant collision may be avoided.

But let us inquire for a moment, whether the evils likely to be incurred by the United States, in case the provisions of the treaty are confined to the direct trade, are of so serious a nature, as to tempt us, even for a moment, to put at hazard our reputation for good faith. So far from believing that we shall suffer by such a construction, I feel perfectly satisfied that we should be the gainers; and, though I am conscious that I approach a subject on which commercial men ought chiefly to be consulted, yet, I will solicit the attention of the House, whilst I distinctly state the reasons of this opinion.

Pursuing the latitude which has been taken by others, I shall embrace in my remarks both the amendments which contemplate a distinction between the direct and indirect trade. There are two clauses of the treaty which are affected by these amendments. The first relates to the equalization of the tonnage, or duties and charges of the vessel, and provides that "no higher or other duty or charges shall be imposed in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels, than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States," with a correspondent provision in favor of the United States. If this provision be confined to the direct trade between the United States and Great Britain, according to the terms of the bill, as amended by the committee, British vessels, it is true, could not enter into a competition with an American vessel, in carrying British articles from the continent of Europe or other foreign ports to America, because the additional tonnage would give a preference to the American bottom. But it must be recollected that a reciprocal disadvantage is incurred by American bottoms in a like trade from the Continent to Great Britain, in American articles; and that, according to the narrow and limited construction contended for, an American vessel could not enter into a competition with a British vessel in the carriage from the Continent to Great Britain. But what will be the operation of the convention? To permit American vessels to compete on equal terms with British vessels, in the carriage of American produce from the Continent and elsewhere, to Great Britain, or in any other trade which is now permitted, or may be hereafter suffered to be carried on in foreign ships at all; and to give a correspondent privilege to British vessels in the trade to the United States of America. Which then is likely to derive the greatest advantage from the regulation? That which is most likely to avail itself extensively of the privileges of the convention. And which is most likely to avail itself extensively of these privileges? The American ship owner, I presume, since the proximity of the ports between which he will generally trade, will make the pursuit more convenient and more profitable than that in which the British ship owner can be employed, under the same provisions of the convention. It seems manifest, for instance, that it would be much more convenient for an American to enter into the trade between Portugal and England, distant from each other only a few days' sail, than for an Englishman to engage in the trade between Portugal and the United States, separated as they are by an ocean of 3,000 miles; if so, more of our ship owners than of the British, are likely to avail themselves of the privileges of the treaty, and of course we shall gain more than we can lose by its stipulations, in relation to tonnage, according to the construction for which I contend.

So much then for the provision in relation to the tonnage. Let us next see what is the operation of the next clause.

It provides that "the same duties shall be paid 'on the importation into the United States of 'any articles, the growth, produce, or manufacture 'of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe, 'whether such importation be in American or 'British vessels,' with a correspondent provision in favor of American articles. The remarks already made in relation to the former clause apply with the same force to this. There is, it is true, but little probability of either of the two nations engaging in an indirect trade, so long as this convention lasts, by which the direct trade is permitted on such advantageous terms. In the nature of things, every merchant will prefer the direct to the roundabout trade. The importation into the United States, of British articles from foreign ports other than those of Great Britain, will, therefore, rarely take place, and will, I presume, be confined to cases where the British goods do not find a ready sale in the foreign market, and are sent to America from thence, as affording a better prospect of mercantile advantage. So, too, the importation into the ports of Great Britain, from continental ports, of American merchandise, will only occur when the American merchant, after reaching the foreign port, finds it to his advantage to change his market, and sends his cargo from its first port of destination to Great Britain. Which of these cases is likely to occur most frequently? Is it more probable that the exporter of manufactures from Great Britain will find it necessary to change his market, and send his goods from the continent of Europe or other foreign ports to the United States, or that the American exporter of tobacco and cotton will, on his arrival at a continental port, find his advantage in looking for a better market in London or Liverpool? The latter, without doubt. The former must rarely happen—the latter, as my friend from Louisiana has already intimated, occurs very frequently. Great disadvantage in such cases would, of course, be experienced, if the American merchant should, in the foreign port, when he wished to change his market, encounter additional tonnage and additional imports, in case he made use of an American vessel for the transportation. In truth, no American vessel could enter into the competition with British bottoms under such unpropitious circumstances. Yet would this be precisely the state of things if the treaty be confined to the direct trade. On the other hand, if it applies also to the indirect trade, the tobacco and cotton, and other bulky articles, of American export, may change their market without its being necessary to seek for British vessels, to the exclusion of those of the United States; and American vessels would thus monopolize very soon the freight from which they are now excluded.

I cannot, therefore, but believe, that it is our interest to contend, that the convention, according to the true construction of it, comprehends the indirect as well as the direct trade. That such was the intention of the American commissioners, and the wish of the American Government, is indeed strongly inferrible from the existence of the act of Congress, read by the gentleman from Louisiana, in which the most general terms are used, equally comprehensive with those in the convention, and equally embracing indirect as well as direct trade. With this strong and decisive expression of the legislative will, the Executive have concluded this convention. They seem to have followed the expressions of the act, nor could they or the commissioners be justly censured, if the provisions were really disadvantageous. Believing the contrary, as I do, I cannot give my assent to an amendment which would exclude us from a fair advantage gained by the treaty; and, even if my impressions on this subject were different, I should think it improper to attempt a legislative exposition of the instrument. As I have already intimated, it seems to me that it would be most advisable to leave the construction, if doubtful, to be settled between the Executives of the two nations, without hazarding collision or a breach of faith, by introducing into the law our own interpretation.

Mr. GASTON said, that he had yesterday, in Committee of the Whole, expressed an opinion in relation to this bill, which subsequent reflection had convinced him was erroneous. He had remarked, that although the bill was in his judgment unnecessary, it was nevertheless harmless. He was now satisfied that the bill was not only unnecessary, but of a pernicious character; and while he owed it to the House to retract his error, he owed to himself an apology for adopting it. The fact was, that believing the House of Representatives could have no agency in executing the commercial convention between the United States and Great Britain, and having his attention much occupied with public business of a different character, he had thought very little of the convention itself, or of the bill which had been introduced for carrying it into effect. And when it was remarked by a member of the committee, that a law re-enacting what he (Mr. G.) supposed to be already law, was at worst but a superfluous act of legislation, and could not therefore do harm; the remark seemed plausible, and commanded his assent for the moment. Perfectly persuaded, however, that this impression was incorrect, and that any legislation by the House was full of mischief, he would submit a motion calculated to try the principle of the bill. He therefore moved its indefinite postponement.

In making this motion, he assured the House, that he was not actuated by anything like a spirit of opposition. He had come into Congress with a perfect disposition to co-operate with his associates of whatever political party, in any measures which might promote the public weal. And he indulged the hope, that now, when the troubled night of war had departed, and the day-star of peace again beamed on our land, there would be at least a short interval of calm and sunshine, in which all could work cheerfully and harmoniously together.

In attempting to show the impropriety of the bill, Mr. G. would endeavor, if possible, not to tread upon the ground consecrated by party prejudice. He believed it was not necessary for his argument to lay down any principles in relation to the effect of a treaty constitutionally made, that might not be conceded as correct by the ancient champions of the party which now held the government of the Union. It would no doubt be recollected, that a vehement contest about the efficacy of the British Treaty had taken place in the House of Representatives, at an early period of our Federal Government. He could not undertake to speak confidently of the opinions of all who took part in that controversy, (for it was a long while since he had read the debate,) but he believed the great point in contestation, was the nature of the obligation on the House of Representatives to make appropriations in conformity to the treaty. One class of politicians (and he believed them right,) considered it as a moral obligation which could only yield to obligations of a paramount kind. The other class of politicians viewed it as an obligation of discretion only, which left the House a full right to judge of the expediency or in expediency of the treaty. There could not have been a serious difference of opinion among the wise and able men of either side, whether a treaty constitutionally made, upon a subject fit for a treaty, was or was not a law; to be executed by the Executive, expounded by the Judiciary, as other laws made in other forms, prescribed by the Constitution. The words of that instrument were too precise to admit of rational doubt. "This Constitution, and the laws of the United States, which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land."—Art. 6, part 2d. "He the (President) shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed."—Art. 2d, sec. 3d. "The judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and the treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority."—Art. 3, sec. 2.

That it was never supposed necessary to impart a legislative sanction to a treaty, in order to vest it with every attribute of a law, was further evinced by the uniform practice of our Government under different Administrations. Notwithstanding the British Treaty contained various provisions of a commercial character, no act of Congress was passed to carry them into effect. The sole legislation which took place was an act making appropriations for the pay of the Commissioners to be appointed under the treaty. This was done precisely upon the same principles as an appropriation is made to defray the expenses attending the execution of other laws; not because the treaty or the laws require such sanction to give them validity, but because, by the Constitution, public revenue can only be disbursed in consequence of regular appropriations. But there was a later precedent, directly in point, and which some gentlemen might be disposed to regard with greater reverence. In the convention which was concluded between the United States and the First Consul of the French Republic, there was an article stipulating that captures made on either side should be restored. The French ship Berceau had been captured by us long before, and by the laws of the land had become the absolute property of the nation. No act of Congress was passed, none was supposed necessary, to enable the President to transfer this property of the nation to the French Republic. The treaty was deemed law sufficient for that purpose, and the then President (Mr. Jefferson) caused the Berceau to be restored according to the treaty.

Mr. G. was perfectly aware that treaties, like other laws, might be so made as to require the aid of supplemental legislation. Such, however, was not the case with the convention referred to in this bill. A remark was yesterday made by a gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. FORSYTH,) designed to show that this convention needed such auxiliary legislation; but, on reflection, he was satisfied that the remark was not well founded. The gentleman observed that the convention stipulated only for an equality of duties in certain cases, upon importations in British and American vessels, without specifying whether this equality was to be produced by raising the rates on American vessels, or depressing those on British vessels. It will be found, however, said Mr. G., that the treaty, in this respect, executes itself. We have laws fixing the rate of tonnage on American vessels, and the duties on importations in them. Other laws prescribe that additional rates and duties shall be imposed in the case of foreign vessels. A treaty is then made with Great Britain prescribing that her vessels shall be subject to the same rates and duties as are levied on American ships. As this treaty is a law of the land, it should be construed precisely as any other law. Suppose the stipulations were contained in an act of Congress, then, upon the principle that the subsequent acts repeal so much of the prior acts as is inconsistent with them, the effect assuredly is to except British ships from the operation of the laws affecting foreign vessels generally. Whatever your duties may be in regard to American bottoms, the same duties are, by the treaty, made to apply to British ships.

Mr. G. said that these observations were designed to prove, and, in his judgment, did prove, that the bill was unnecessary. This, however, was but introductory to the position which he had advanced, that the bill was of a dangerous and injurious character. In a Government of laws, it was always to be desired that those who were called on to obey, and those who were appointed to expound the national will, should not be perplexed and embarrassed by superfluous regulations. But there were prominent and especial evils following from an unnecessary legislation in regard to treaties. The power of making them, said Mr. G., is, by the Constitution, vested in the President, calling to his aid the counsel of the Senate. If this power be so exercised that the treaty can execute itself, what is the effect of an unnecessary law enacted for its execution? To the thoughtless and superficial it might seem merely an encroachment upon the prerogative of the Executive, and this might not be deemed an evil very much to be dreaded by the friends of political freedom. But, in fact, it is not a diminution of the power of the Executive; it is a diminution only of his responsibility. The law confers no additional validity on the treaty; it is altogether inoperative, except as an implied sanction of the terms of the treaty. The President is answerable for making a bad compact; but, under the form and pretence of enlarging legislative power, a shield is to be interposed between him and the public censure.

Besides, if the precedent be established that a treaty must be legislated into validity, an obligation is imposed upon the Legislature, and every branch of it, to make the provisions of the law conform strictly to the stipulations of the treaty. In other words, the Legislature must expound the treaty. It is easy to point out some striking absurdities which would result from this doctrine, though it is difficult to imagine all that will arise from it. Let us suppose a complex treaty, in the exposition of parts of which there is an honest and important difference of opinion between the two branches of the Legislature. What is to be done? Ordinary difference of opinion which cannot be removed, and where co-operation is necessary, may be adjusted by compromise. But on this subject compromise is impracticable. The sacrifices required to be mutually made are not of opinion on a question of expediency, but of conscience on a matter of right. Each is bound by the highest of obligations to expound the treaty according to the design of its framers. If, in this exposition, they cannot agree, the treaty cannot be expounded, the legislative sanction cannot be given, and the plighted faith of the nation must be broken.

Again, it must be admitted, for the Constitution is, on this particular, clear and imperative, that the judicial power shall apply to all cases arising under a treaty, and of necessity in its application to such cases must expound the treaty. How is this judicial power to be exercised when the courts who are invested with it shall not agree to the correctness of your exposition? Are they to be bound by your exposition? If so, then their power is not applied to cases as they arise under the treaty, but as they arise under your statute. If they are not bound by your exposition, then your act, instead of vivifying the treaty, is itself a dead letter. If they sacrifice their consciences to adopt your construction, they do not exercise judicial power on the treaty; if they do not make this sacrifice, but exercise the judicial power which the Constitution gives them, then you have a law, and a Constitutional law, which your own tribunals have a Constitutional right to disregard.

But one would suppose that a stronger argument to prove the danger of this legislative enactment of a treaty could not be afforded, than is to be found by attending to the course which has been pursued on this bill. Not to dwell upon the singular absurdity of one of the amendments which it has been thought necessary to incorporate into it; an amendment which declares this bill a law twenty days before it is or can become a law under the Constitution, the House is perplexed in discussing the meaning of various passages in the treaty admitted to be ambiguous, and for the correct interpretation of them is referred by the chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations—to what? To information officially laid before it? To authentic documents in its possession? No; the House is referred to a correspondence between the negotiators of the two nations, which the gentleman (Mr. FORSYTH) tells us has been laid before the Senate; and a part of which he reads from a paper printed (as he also informs us) for the use of the Senate. For what purpose was this correspondence laid before the Senate? Assuredly it must have been to aid them in understanding the treaty before they should give advice as to its ratification. But the House of Representatives, although bound to aid in legislating the treaty into operation, and in framing a law which shall conform to its precise meaning; and though greatly embarrassed to divine his meaning in consequence of the vagueness of the treaty, is left to act without the benefit of this necessary information, except it be of such fragments as may be doled out by the bounty of the Senate, or picked up by the industry or good fortune of its members. If this House have to expound the treaty, it is entitled to the possession of every document which can throw light upon its meaning. It cannot be called on to act, and be denied the means to act with intelligence. These means, there is but one authentic and Constitutional mode of laying before us. They must be officially communicated, or the House, in respecting them, will show a want of respect for itself.

Mr. G. concluded, by remarking that if the House should concur with him in the opinion that the convention was complete in itself, and needed no legislative aid to carry it into effect, they ought to be exceedingly cautious in setting a precedent which was calculated to mislead and embarrass. Although no immediate injury might result from the act in this case, other than the delay and the difficulty of getting at the meaning of this treaty, yet immense inconveniences might flow from following such a precedent, in cases of more complexity. As the bill was a departure from the established usage of the Government—unnecessary, and likely as a precedent to be productive of mischief hereafter—he believed the wise and safe course was to decline acting further upon it.

Mr. WRIGHT said, he hoped and trusted the amendment proposed to this bill would not be adopted. The bill had for its object, he said, the establishment of an uniformity of the impost and tonnage, as well as of the drawbacks on articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe, imported into any of the ports of the United States. The amendment proposes to limit the importations by adding, "directly from the territories aforesaid." The treaty, in its terms, may include the indirect as well as the direct trade, and has been ratified by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and has become the supreme law of the land. This treaty is a compact between Great Britain and the United States. The British Parliament has no power but to pass laws to carry treaties into effect—the King has the sole power of making them; and here the President and Senate have the power of the King, from whence results the impropriety of our attempting, in a law to carry the treaty into effect, any additions to the treaty. We have no diplomatic power. If there is any ambiguity in any article, we, who represent only one of the parties, have no power to bind the other party by any act or construction; that can be effected only by an explanatory article made by the agents of both parties. Sir, in any contestation about the treaty and its true import, this amendment, if adopted, could not be considered as part of the instrument. The treaty is a record, and like all others, can be tried only by itself. I ask, if the Judiciary, in expounding this treaty, were to be of opinion that it included the indirect as well as the direct trade, what would be the operation of the proposed amendment, if adopted? It certainly would be considered as the act of but one party, as having no operation in the case, a work therefore, of supererogation.

Mr. GASTON having moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill indefinitely—

The bill was, on motion by Mr. TUCKER, laid on the table.

LAWS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to authorize a subscription to such laws of the United States as relate exclusively to the District of Columbia.

The bill was zealously supported by Mr. TUCKER, and opposed by Mr. WRIGHT and others.

On motion of Mr. CANNON, the number of copies proposed to be subscribed for (one thousand) was reduced to three hundred.

The bill having been reported to the House, some further discussion took place on it.

On the question of ordering the bill to be read a third time, there were, for the bill 44, against it 64.

So the bill was rejected.

Mr. PICKENS then adverted to the miserable system of jurisprudence, by which this territory was ruled, composed of the laws of Virginia on one side, and Maryland on the other side of the river, as they stood fifteen or twenty years ago, the people of the District being deprived of the advantages of subsequent amendments made by these States; and, after remarking on the inability of Congress to devote time from more weighty occupations to examine and reform the judicial system of the District, moved, in substance,

"That the Committee on the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of employing a suitable person to prepare a code of jurisprudence for the District of Columbia, to be laid before Congress for their adoption."

Mr. TUCKER moved that the Judiciary Committee be substituted for the District Committee, as well because he desired the aid of other talents on this subject than of the chairman of the District Committee, (meaning himself,) as because that committee had already as much business before them as they would be able to despatch, especially if they met with no better encouragement from the House than had attended his exertions this day.

Mr. TUCKER's motion to amend was agreed to by a small majority; and, thus amended, the motion of Mr. PICKENS was agreed to.

MONDAY, January 8.

Several other members, to wit: from Maryland, WILLIAM PINKNEY; from Virginia, JOHN RANDOLPH; and from Tennessee, WILLIAM G. BLOUNT, appeared, produced their credentials, were qualified, and took their seats.

Mr. HULBERT presented a petition of the proprietors of the Boston Glass Manufactory, praying that such measures may be adopted as will afford to the manufacturers of glass, the security and encouragement necessary to the continuance of their manufactures.

Mr. MILLS presented a petition of the manufacturers of cotton and woollen cloth, in the counties of Hampshire, Franklin, and Hampden, in the State of Massachusetts, praying that the duties at present imposed on all cotton and woollen fabrics imported from foreign countries may be increased; that the importation of cotton goods from places beyond the Cape of Good Hope may be prohibited; that American cotton and woollen fabrics may be exclusively used for the Army and Navy; that the existing duty on foreign indigo and olive oil may be repealed; and that a National Bank may be established.

Mr. LAW presented a similar petition from sundry manufacturers of cotton goods in the State of Connecticut.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, presented a petition of the Lexington White Lead Manufacturing Company, praying that a duty of six cents per pound may be imposed on white lead imported from foreign countries.

Ordered. That the said petitions be referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. WENDOVER presented a petition of the manufacturers of tobacco, in the city of New York, praying that the act laying duties on manufactured tobacco may be repealed, and that the bonds which they have entered into may be returned to them.

Mr. KING, of North Carolina, presented a petition of Thomas Cowan, and others, manufacturers of salt on the seacoast of North Carolina, praying that the direct tax imposed upon their establishments may be remitted, as their works have been destroyed by high water, and that the duty on a quantity of salt which was also destroyed, may be also remitted.—Referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. MURFREE presented a resolution of the Legislature of the State of North Carolina, requesting the Senators and Representatives in Congress, from that State, to use their best endeavours to prevail on the General Government to open a direct outlet to the ocean for the waters of the Albemarle Sound.—Referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

On motion of Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads was instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing the 4th and 6th sections of an act passed at the last session of Congress, entitled "An act in addition to the act regulating the Post Office establishment," or of exempting from the operation of the said sections, vessels whose business is confined to the bays and rivers of the United States and the Territories thereof, and are not employed in the carriage of the mail.

COMMERCE WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill to regulate the commerce of the United States, according to the Convention of Commerce with Great Britain—the question being on the motion of Mr. GASTON to postpone the bill indefinitely.

Mr. FORSYTH said that the motion for an indefinite postponement of the bill, made by the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. GASTON,) rested upon the ground that it was not necessary to legislate upon the subject of the convention. Mr. F. presumed that it was not the intention of gentlemen to enter into the investigation of the extent of the treaty-making power, or of the nature of the obligation imposed by a treaty when made. He could not suppose it was intended to rake up the ashes of the dispute on that question in the year 1795. The Constitutional principle had been settled so far as it depended upon the Representatives of the people at that period on the first treaty with a foreign Government which had been concluded after the adoption of the Constitution. By referring to the journals of the proceedings of Congress, it would be found, that the principle established was, "that when a treaty stipulates regulations on any of the subjects submitted by the Constitution to the power of Congress, it must depend for its execution, as to such stipulations, on a law or laws, to be passed by Congress." The recollection of the gentleman from North Carolina was, therefore, not faithful, when he supposed the doctrine of that day confined the power of Congress, in the execution of treaties, to cases of appropriation only. The rule was general, and applied to all cases, without distinction, over which power was specially given by the Constitution to the legislative department. This general rule, since that period, has been uniformly and consistently observed. In the execution of the British Treaty, no law was passed at the period of the memorable dispute already alluded to, but one appropriating money; but the cause might be discovered by referring to the treaty itself. None of its provisions were inconsistent with the existing laws. Subsequently, however, it was found necessary to provide by law for the faithful execution of the 19th article. By this article it was stipulated, that when one party was a belligerent, and the other a neutral Power, to prevent injury to the property, &c., of the neutral upon the ocean, from the improper conduct of the captains and crews of private armed vessels, the owner and master should give bond and security in the sum of fifteen hundred or three thousand pounds, according to the size of the vessel and the number of her crew, to answer for the injuries which might be sustained by such misconduct. When the quasi war was authorized against France, the President was empowered to grant commissions to private armed vessels; the stipulation of the treaty was embodied in the act of Congress. The same provision was made in nearly the same words, in the war against Tripoli. The conduct of the Government had been regulated by the same rule in their legislative acts to carry into effect the treaty with Spain. An appropriation law was passed to pay the necessary expenses. This was all that was then deemed necessary. But the 10th article of the treaty intended to provide for the case of vessels of either nation, forced by distress into the ports of the other. The condition of the treaty was dictated both by policy and humanity. It was, that the goods thus forced under the protection of either of the contracting parties should, if landed, be reloaded and carried away, without the payment of the customary duty either on the vessel or cargo. No act was passed until the case actually occurred. Sometime during or before the year 1804, the Spanish brigantine Nancy came into Norfolk in distress. In order to give to her owners the benefit of the treaty stipulation, it was deemed necessary to pass an act remitting the duties in that particular instance, and providing that they should not be payable in similar instances in future. The treaty with France in 1801 had been alluded to by the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. GASTON.) By referring to the appropriation act, passed in consequence of the ratification of that treaty, it will be found to contain a declaration of the obligation to return vessels captured during the war, according to the condition of the convention. Mr. F. presumed that this was supposed a sufficient authority for the delivery of the Berceau by the President, in performance of the conditions of the treaty. The statute book was full of examples, but none were more decisive than those founded upon the cession of Louisiana to the United States by France in 1803. Although France ceded it to the United States, and of course governed by their laws, so far as they were applicable to its situation, at that time it was deemed most expedient to pass an act to lay and collect duties on imports and tonnage within the said territory. In this act provision was made to secure to French and Spanish ships the commercial advantages which were promised as one of the conditions of the cession. But this was not all: In the year 1800, an act was passed, allowing drawback of duties on goods exported from the United States to New Orleans, being a foreign port. Although the reason of this act had ceased, and it might have been considered repealed by the transfer of this port to the United States, it was supposed necessary to repeal the act by an act of Congress, passed in 1803.

Louisiana, too, was admitted into the Union, not by treaty stipulation, but by an act of Congress, in performance of the obligation imposed by it.

Mr. F. said that no difference was made by the Constitution between treaties with foreign Powers, and treaties made with the Indians within the territorial limits of the United States. The rule had been extended to them. Without enumerating the particular cases, he could refer to an arrangement which had been made with all the Indian tribes with whom we had entered into compacts—that crimes committed by whites upon Indians, within the Indian territory, should be punished in the same manner as if the same offence had been committed upon a citizen of the United States, within the jurisdiction of some district of the United States. This engagement had been complied with, so far as it could be complied with, by the Government. Prosecutions had been instituted against those who had been accused of such offences. Mr. F. did not remember of any punishments; but this was not the fault of the Government. These prosecutions were, however, commenced, not upon the treaty, but upon the law, made in consequence of the treaty engagement. These remarks, Mr. F. trusted, would satisfy the House, that the course proposed to be pursued, in relation to the late convention with Great Britain, was perfectly in unison with the practice in all former cases, and justified by the rule upon which that practice had been founded. The only difference between the present and former cases was, that in this case the convention stipulates advantages to British vessels, which cannot be enjoyed without an alteration of the system of revenue, and repeal of existing laws. Some gentlemen had imagined that the law of the last session, on the subject of discriminating duties, contained all the necessary provisions to meet this contract between the two countries. This was a mistaken opinion. The law of the last session repealed our discriminating duties on tonnage, &c., of foreign vessels, and on goods imported in foreign vessels, upon a condition which has not happened, that is: that an abolition of all the discriminating duties, so far as they were injurious to the commerce of the United States, should have taken place in that foreign nation to which the vessels and goods should belong. The treaty between this country and Great Britain stipulates an abolition of discriminating duties only in the ports of His Britannic Majesty's European dominions. Mr. F. said it was somewhat extraordinary that it should be doubted in this country whether the House of Representatives were authorized to act upon a subject which, in England, would have required the interposition of the House of Commons. He did not intend to draw any argument from the resemblance of the two Governments; the Executive power, including its authority to make treaties, was more limited than in Great Britain. Yet in Great Britain, this very treaty will require an act of Parliament before it can be carried completely into effect; an act which some of us will live long enough to see. This was the ordinary course in that country. At some of the most remarkable periods in British history, instances had occurred. A commercial treaty was negotiated between France and England, after the peace of Utrecht; it was not carried into effect, because the House of Commons rejected the bill introduced by the Ministry to alter the commercial and revenue laws according to the compact between the two nations. In the year 1786, a treaty of commerce between those nations, was carried into effect by an act of Parliament, framed according to its stipulations. Mr. F. said, that the Order in Council of the 17th August, 1815, which he had taken occasion to read to the House a day or two before, was founded upon an act of Parliament, passed, as he had understood, for the express purpose of enabling the Prince Regent to conform the existing regulations of commerce to the treaty which might be made by the Ministers of the United States and Great Britain, and in the discussion of the principles of which they were then engaged. The Order in Council, like the act upon which it was founded, was to continue in force until six weeks after the next session of Parliament. Within these six weeks after the meeting of Parliament, the necessary provision will, no doubt, be made by the competent authority in the ordinary mode.

The gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. GASTON) had advanced a singular opinion, that by exercising the power of passing laws to give effect to treaties, you diminish the responsibility without diminishing the power of the President and Senate. Mr. F. could not conceive how a check upon the exercise of any authority could diminish the responsibility of the person to whom it was granted. It was certainly true, when Congress passed acts according to the provision of a treaty, they declared to the people, it was better to perform the stipulations it contained, than to violate the faith of the nation, which had been pledged by the Constitutional authority. But if Congress, from a conviction that the rights of the people had been wantonly surrendered or the national honor tarnished by treaty, should refuse to pass the laws necessary for its execution, the President and Senate would feel, what they can feel in no other way, the responsibility under which their power is exercised.

It had been said, that treaties are the law of the land. It is so printed in the margin of the article of the Constitution to which the gentleman (Mr. GASTON) had referred, and it seemed to be taken for granted, that law and treaty were convertible terms. If this idea is correct, the distinction taken between acts of appropriation to pay the expenses of treaties, and other legislative acts to carry them into effect, is unnecessary. The Constitution says, that money shall not be drawn out of the Treasury unless appropriations are previously made by law. But a treaty being a law, an appropriation may be made by treaty. But, Mr. F. said, the object of that part of the Constitution was, to declare the supremacy of the Constitution, acts made in pursuance thereof, and treaties made or to be made under the authority of the United States, over the constitutions and laws of the States. The relative force or effects of treaties and laws was to be collected from the whole charter; from the nature and dependence of its parts—from the objects over which treaties and laws severally operated—and from the intention of the people by whom the power of making them were granted, and for whose benefit they are to be exercised. But, Mr. F. said, the examination of these topics would require him to enter further into the Constitutional question than he wished or intended to go. For the present he would content himself with the expression of the general proposition upon the basis of which the bill had been reported. Whenever a treaty contains anything contrary to the Constitution, it is void; whenever it contains anything contrary to existing laws, the laws must be repealed by Congress before the engagement can be complied with; because the Constitution can be altered only by the Constitutional mode of amendment. A law can be repealed only by the authority which enacted it.

Mr. F. said, although the question respecting the propriety of the amendments made in Committee of the whole House, was superseded by the motion of indefinite postponement, he hoped to be indulged with a few observations in reply to some suggestions of the gentleman from Louisiana, (Mr. ROBERTSON;) from Virginia, (Mr. TUCKER;) and from North Carolina, (Mr. GASTON.) He was not conscious of having committed any impropriety in referring to documents printed by order of the Senate. He did not suppose information was less valuable in one form than in another. He had not taken his construction of the treaty from the correspondence he had quoted, but from the instrument itself, and he could not see the irrationality or irregularity of referring to such documents for the confirmation of an opinion previously formed. From the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. GASTON) he certainly did not expect observations of the character which had dropped from him, as he had been informed that they agreed in opinion, upon the construction of that article of the convention which had been the source of discussion.

Mr. F. said, he was not induced to offer the amendments to the Committee, by a belief that such a construction was advantageous to the United States, but simply because he believed it to have been the intention of the parties. If the calculation of advantages was to govern the construction, the amendments ought not to prevail. It had been suggested by the gentlemen from Virginia and Louisiana, that vessels of the United States, bound to France and Spain, might reach the port of destination, and finding a bad market might choose to go to England in search of a better. Gentlemen asked if such vessels were to be deprived of the benefits of this treaty. Mr. F. said, he was not able to speak with precision and certainty on this subject, but, according to his present impressions, he believed that a vessel under such circumstances would be considered as engaged in the trade between France or Spain and Great Britain, and not in the trade between the United States and Great Britain. Mr. F. apologized for this digression from the question, and concluded by reserving to himself the privilege of entering more fully into the examination of the treaty-making power, if it should be made necessary by the discussion, which had been so unprofitably and unnecessarily commenced.

Mr. BARBOUR said, the bill now before the House proposed to regulate the commerce between the United States and Great Britain, according to the convention concluded on 3d July, 1815; a motion had been made for its indefinite postponement; and the reason assigned for that motion was, that the convention itself was conclusive upon the subject, without the aid of any legislative act.

The question then, said he, which this motion presents, is, whether legislation upon the subject, be, or be not an act of supererogation; it will be my endeavor to prove that it is not; in other words, I shall attempt to maintain this proposition, that whenever a treaty operates upon a subject, which, like the present, is amongst the enumerated powers of legislation, delegated by the Constitution to Congress—that in such case, the assent and co-operation of Congress are necessary to give effect to such treaty, by the passage of a law, in compliance with its stipulations.

The correctness of this proposition depends upon the proper construction of the Constitution of the United States, in relation to the legislative and treaty-making powers. It is from this source mainly, that both the opposers and the advocates of this bill attempt to derive support.

If I understand the argument of its opposers, it amounts in substance, to this—the Constitution, say they, gives to the President and Senate the right of making treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and it declares, that treaties when thus made shall be the supreme law of the land. Now this treaty has been ratified in the mode prescribed; it is therefore the supreme law of the land, and what is already the supreme law, can derive no additional validity from any other law.

But, sir, in what does this supremacy consist? Is it in a superiority over the Constitution and laws of the United States? The Constitution itself answers to this question, that it is not; for it will be seen that the same clause which declares treaties the supreme law of the land, associates with them the Constitution and laws of the United States; it throws the three into one class, and declares that the whole class, to wit: the Constitution of the United States, the laws of the United States, and treaties made under their authority, shall be the supreme law of the land—supreme over what? The next paragraph answers the question, by declaring, that the judges of every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or law of any State to the contrary, notwithstanding. It is obvious, that the supremacy is a term of relation to the States; the United States, and its Constitution, laws and treaties, are put in competition with the States and their constitutions and laws; and as it respects the latter, the former are declared to be supreme; but there is no gradation of superiority between the Constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States as amongst themselves. This doctrine of supremacy, then, has no influence upon the present question.

But gentlemen who oppose the bill, contend, that the power of making treaties is given in general terms; there is no exception of the subject-matter of this treaty, therefore it is included; and consequently, that the treaty-making power is competent, of itself, to give complete effect to treaty stipulations upon the subject of commerce, without legislative aid.

If there were no other part of the Constitution which had a bearing upon this question, there would be more solidity in the argument; but there are other important provisions of the Constitution, which have direct relation to the question; and it is indispensable to a just construction of that instrument that, they be taken together. Sir, this is the universal rule for the construction of all instruments, that, to arrive at a just interpretation of their meaning, you must not take isolated parts, but the whole instrument together.

The propriety of this rule of construction, so reasonable in itself, will be proven, I think, beyond question, by the comparison which I am about to make between that part of the Constitution which confers the treaty-making power, and those parts of the same instrument which relate to the legislative power; from this comparison, it seems to me necessarily to result—that the grant of legislative power, quo ad the subject granted, must operate some limitation, some check upon the treaty-making power; or otherwise, the partition between the different branches of the Government will be broken down; the whole character of the Government will be essentially changed; and the treaty-making power, like Aaron's serpent, will swallow up the rest. Having made these general remarks, in relation to the limitations and checks upon the treaty-making power, I will now beg leave to apply them to the immediate bill before us.

The Constitution declares, that all legislative power herein granted shall be vested in Congress; but Congress have heretofore passed laws regulating the commerce between the United States and Great Britain. The treaty stipulates an alteration, a repeal of those regulations; now if the treaty be construed to be conclusive upon the subject, without any act on the part of Congress, must it not be seen, that here is at once legislative power exercised by a branch of the Government other than Congress? This proposition cannot be denied, unless it be contended that the repeal of a law is not an act of legislation; I apprehend it cannot be necessary to prove this proposition. But let us apply this doctrine more closely to the question before us. The Constitution, after depositing with Congress the Legislative power therein granted, proceeds to define that power; among other parts of the enumeration is this: "Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations." Now, sir, this bill, both in its provisions and its title, professes to regulate, and does regulate the commerce between the United States and Great Britain. Here, then, is a power expressly given to Congress; and yet, according to the doctrine now contended for, it may be exercised by the President and two-thirds of the Senators who may be present, without the aid of Congress. Mark the difference. Congress is composed of a Senate and House of Representatives; the treaty-making power of the President and two-thirds of the Senators present; take from Congress the regulation of commerce and give it to the treaty-making power, and you entirely exclude from that important power all that branch of the Government which represents the people directly. Can this construction be correct? If it be, it must be upon the principle, that one part of the Constitution alone is to be consulted, whilst other parts of the same instrument are to be disregarded; for, take them together, and if there be any meaning in words, it is, that as to commerce, Congress shall have power to regulate it; which cannot be, if another branch of Government have power to change that regulation, without consulting or needing the co-operation of that body.

See, sir, to what consequences this doctrine will lead; if the treaty-making power may regulate commerce without the sanction of Congress, then the same Power may declare war without the sanction of Congress; because the very same Constitution which gives Congress the one power gives them the other; and if they may be deprived of one, by parity of reason, they may be deprived of the other. And yet, sir, I believe no gentleman has met this part of the argument by affirming that the nation can be involved in war by treaty; they have seen that such a doctrine would carry them too far; that it would go to the extent of justifying a treaty of alliance offensive and defensive, which might involve us in all the calamities of war, by entangling us in European contests; when it is distinctly understood to have been the intention of the Constitution, that this nation should never be involved in war, but by the voice of the immediate Representatives of the people: this is the great, the safe guarantee, that war will never be undertaken but for some great national object, when, and when only, the people will go with their Representatives. But this doctrine, if true, does not stop here; it goes further, it will justify a treaty stipulation to supply a subsidy, and will thus violate that part of the Constitution which declares that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but by an appropriation made by law. Sir, it goes one step further yet; it would justify the subsidy of which I have just spoken, without limitation as to time, though the Constitution expressly declares, that even Congress shall not make an appropriation for the support of armies for more than two years.

Now, sir, the criterion by which to test a position is, to trace it to its consequences; if it leads directly to such, as even its author cannot defend, there is no principle in logic clearer than, that such a position, though it may be specious, is not solid. I am persuaded that no member will go the length of maintaining the position, which I have been examining, in the consequences to which I have pursued it; by this rule, then, they must give up the position itself.

It seems to me to be shown, then, that although the grant of the treaty-making power, is in words not limited in themselves, yet, a just construction of the Constitution affixes to it these two kinds of limitation; first, that nothing can be done by treaty, which the Constitution declares shall not be done; secondly, that whenever the subject of a treaty is one of the powers delegated to Congress, that then the assent and co-operation of Congress are necessary to give it effect, by passing a law in conformity with its stipulations. And this, sir, is the doctrine for which I contend, whilst as a member of the House of Representatives I disclaim all participation in the negotiating and making a treaty.

The member from Georgia has shown, by a minute research into the practice of the Government, that it accords with the construction for which I have contended; I rely upon this, as a strong additional proof of the propriety of that construction.

A reference has been made in the course of the argument to the practice under the British constitution. I know, sir, that this constitution is in itself but a succession of precedents; I know that there are many predominant differences between the British and American constitutions; but there are also some points of analogy: and perhaps few stronger than that in the treaty-making power; in each country, it is confided to the Chief Executive Magistrate, with this difference, that in the United States the Senate are associated with the President. Notwithstanding, however, the treaty-making power in Great Britain resides in the King, yet it appears from the various instances cited by the member from Georgia, to which I will add the Treaty of Peace of 1783, between that country and the United States, that even in Great Britain, the treaty-making power is so far limited as to make it necessary to lay treaties before Parliament, and to ask their aid in making appropriations for carrying them into execution; but if this results in Great Britain, from the power which the House of Commons, without any written constitution, have claimed and established, of holding the purse of the nation, the argument certainly applies with increased force here, where, by the express provision of a written constitution, the subject upon which this treaty operates is amongst the powers delegated to Congress.

I will now beg leave to answer one argument, which seems to be so much relied on, on the other side, as to be considered in itself almost decisive of the question in their favor. It is said, that we have conceded, that the President, with the consent of the Senate, may, without that of Congress, make a Treaty of Peace, and that this is in effect giving up the argument; because, as it requires a law of Congress to declare war, and a Treaty of Peace, upon our own concession, may terminate that war, here is at once an example of a treaty repealing a law. The answer, sir, is this: the Constitution gives to Congress the power to declare war, but it does not give them the power to make peace; it would have been idle to have given such a power. To put this idea in a strong light, let us see what would be the language of a law, enacting peace. Be it enacted, &c., that there shall be peace between the United States and Great Britain. But the enemy, I will suppose, does not choose to be at peace, notwithstanding our law; therefore, the war would continue. It is thus out of our power alone to make peace; but, it is not out of our power to regulate commerce; it is true, that we could not regulate it in British ports; but we could regulate it in our own ports, both as to American and British vessels without their consent. The difference then between a Treaty of Peace and a Treaty of Commerce, is this: the one touches a subject which can only be operated on by treaty; the other embraces a subject which may be regulated without treaty.

This question, sir, occurred in the discussion upon the British treaty, in 1795; it was then very ably discussed; I have no doubt that, in the ideas I have thrown out, I have glided into some of those urged on that occasion; my apology is, that, upon the recurrence of the same question, it is impossible not to fall in some degree into the same train of argument. I conclude, by expressing my hope that the motion for indefinite postponement will not prevail.

Mr. GOLD commenced, with congratulating the House upon the favorable auspices under which the highly important Constitutional question, involved in the passage of the bill under consideration, was presented for determination. The angry passions of war had subsided; party feelings in a great degree hushed to silence, and the public mind in a state of tranquillity, propitious to fair inquiry. He added, the question is not embarrassed with any difficulty or diversity of opinion on the point, whether the treaty is to be carried into effect, for as to that all concurred, and hence, the mere principle, under the Constitution, is presented to the judgment of the House. But, although the treaty in question is not to be affected by this determination, a more important question, in its effect upon the foreign relations of the United States, upon the peace of the country, upon the character of the Government, has hardly arisen under the Constitution. Mr. G. asked, what is the object of the bill? what the evil to be remedied? A mere direction to the custom-house to conform the impost on British tonnage to the rate on American vessels and cargoes. Such is the object, an object which may be attained by the provision of a single paragraph of three lines; and yet, sir, what is the form of the bill before the House for this purpose? It contains all the provisions of the treaty, embodied in the form of an act of Congress. Is it possible to mistake the object of the bill in this form, a form so much broader than the professed end to be attained, than the evil to be remedied? Is it not seen that the bill submits to the House the whole terms, the entire merits of the treaty, and necessarily imposes on the House a consideration of the whole scope and merits of the instrument, the whole field of the negotiation, in the same manner as if it were a common subject of legislation? For this it is confidently submitted, that no precedent will be found either in the memorable treaty with the same nation, negotiated by Mr. Jay, or in any other act in the history of the Government. If an appropriation be required to carry into effect a treaty; if a direction to the custom-house be intended, why not give it, and there stay your hand? Do not embody the treaty in an act of Congress for a solemn precedent, bearing to the world the conclusion that it is not the treaty, but an act of Congress, that creates the law with foreign nations, and fixes the measure of obedience. It cannot be mistaken, he repeated, that the bill, in the form adopted, submits to this House, for its judgment, the merits of the treaty; to approve or disapprove, to give or withhold assent, upon the exercise of legislative discretion, as on ordinary acts of Congress, to the treaty's going into effect. Certainly, the authors of this bill do not present it to Congress, sitting as a Parliament of Paris, to act an humble ministerial part, to become a mere instrument of registry. No, sir, such an appeal would degrade the body, would destroy its attributes, and reduce it from the elevated station assigned it by the Constitution. The positions of the honorable member from Georgia, (Mr. FORSYTH,) who reported and here defends the bill, the authorities he cites in his support, all go to show that the treaty is submitted, by the bill, to the discretion of Congress. That honorable gentleman cites, for authority, examples in the British Parliament, of treaties being defeated, by the refusal of the Commons to concur in the requisite acts to carry them into effect, founded on the ground of disapprobation of the merits of the treaty. Mr. G. added, that he deprecated the influence of such examples upon the proceedings of a Government founded on a written Constitution, of distinct departments and divided powers, and he should be wanting to his duty, if he did not enter his solemn protest against the doctrine thus pressed upon the House. For what, sir, is to be the consequence, but a submission of the treaty-making power, and uprooting the first principles of the Constitution? The measure may not, from the uninteresting provisions of the treaty and general acquiescence, produce immediate evil, and for that cause does not awaken alarm; but the precedent, in other times and under different circumstances, cannot fail to produce consequences most pernicious to the peace and welfare of the United States. Who does not discern the signs of the times? who is so indifferent to what is passing before his eyes, as not to see which are the weaker departments of the Government, and from which encroachments are to be apprehended?

"Treaties shall be the supreme law of the land," is the language of the Constitution. This language is strong and emphatic; and how it is to be satisfied by the construction or rule of the advocates of the bill, has not been shown. On the very face of this measure, we perceive that the treaty can only become a law when united and combined with an act of Congress.

It has been denied, that the Constitution makes a treaty, standing disjunctively and alone, the law of the land, because the sentence includes with treaties the Constitution and acts of Congress. The terms are, "this Constitution, and the laws of the United States, which shall be made in pursuance thereof; and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land;" adding, what resulted necessarily from the provision, that State judges should be bound thereby. This provision presents three distinct and independent sources of law—the Constitution, acts of Congress, and treaties—each standing on its own Constitutional ground, single and alone, unaided by the other; a treaty requiring no more the aid of an act of Congress to its validity, than an act of Congress does that of a treaty. If in any case, certainly not the present, an act of Congress be required in execution of a treaty, not to its validity, the duty is imperative on Congress as much as it is the duty of the Judiciary department to hear and give judgment on an act, and of the Executive to cause the sentence to be executed.

It has been said by an honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. BARBOUR,) that the operation of the above provision is on the constitutions and laws of the separate States, in making a treaty a law in relation to them, but not so as to the legislative power of Congress. I can perceive nothing in the Constitution to justify this partial and strange construction, and it is not a little difficult to conceive how a treaty can become a law in one place and not another; how it can bind the States severally as a law, and not the United States. The same honorable gentleman attempted to sustain the authority of Congress to interfere with commercial treaties, on the provision in the Constitution which gives to Congress the general power to regulate commerce, insisting that this power could not be infringed or impaired by the treaty-making power.

If this be the Constitution, we are poor, indeed, in the authority of the President and Senate, in the treaty department; for commerce is the great field in the foreign relations of the Government; and at no remote period it may well be imagined, that that field will be so occupied by legislative regulations, as to leave little, very little, for a commercial treaty to operate upon. But, as the rule was applied by the honorable gentleman, the legislative power may supersede the stipulations of a subsisting treaty on the subject, under the power of regulating commerce, because it is a Constitutional power, and not subject to treaty stipulations; and although an act confirmatory of the treaty may have been passed, the same body, in the exercise of this unalienable power of the Constitution, may repeal it.

In the application of this principle, the honorable member insists that an act of Congress is necessary to reduce the impost on British tonnage to that of American tonnage, conformably to the treaty; that an act cannot be abrogated or annulled, without a repealing act for the purpose. If this be so, what has become of the most important act this Government ever passed—the act declaring war against Great Britain, passed in June, 1812? Is it yet in force for want of a statute repeal, or did it not fall under the operation of the treaty-making power? The case leaves no escape; the power to declare war is exclusively in Congress; the act for that purpose most eventful, and its abrogation by the treaty without question.

Is it, then, any longer to be doubted, but that the treaty in question is competent to modify the tonnage duty on British shipping? If it be not, Mr. G. said, he looked in vain for any operation or effect of the treaty power; the very provision is subverted, and the terms, "supreme law of the land," a dead letter. For, Mr. Speaker, the very definition of "law," as "a rule of action," as assigning to each and every member of the community his duty, cannot, in its necessary application under the treaty, fail to reach and fix the duty of the custom-house officer on the point in question. If it fall short of this, the provisions of the treaty are no more than propositions or projects for Congress to adopt or reject, at discretion.

Mr. HOPKINSON said, that not anticipating that this bill, which was laid upon the table but yesterday, would so soon be called up for discussion, he had not given that reflection to it, which was necessary for an argument on its principles. Such thoughts and suggestions, however, as had occurred to him on the moment, he would offer to the House with all possible brevity, and a sincere wish that he had been able to give more consideration to their matter, and a better shape to their manner. The gentlemen who press the passage of this bill, said he, seem to take a range of observation far wider than the subject, and to travel over ground not necessary now to be explored. The subject itself offers matter enough for consideration, and of sufficient importance too to deserve the undivided attention of the House. Their ingenuity has been exerted, and their imagination put into action, to create and combine cases of supposed treaties, which would require the aid of the House to carry them into effect, and which must be submitted to its power and control. That cases may occur, and surely that cases may be imagined, in which this House might find itself exceedingly embarrassed by a treaty made by the President and Senate, cannot be denied; but is the case now before us of that description? Does anybody feel the least reluctance to have the convention go into operation? Does anybody say its provisions are of a kind to require any aid from us to carry them into execution, as where money is required, or some collateral assistance, before the treaty can be consummated by performance? Why, then, shall we fret and embarrass ourselves with possible cases of difficulty, when we are called upon only to decide one, in which there is no difficulty? The cases put are all of an extreme kind, from which it is seldom safe to draw an argument. When, however, they shall occur, they will be met by the House with proper firmness and discretion; on a full view of all its rights and duties, as regulated by the Constitution, conscientiously performing the latter, and assuming no more of the former than it is entitled to. But let us leave those cases until they do occur: "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

The question now before the House is, "Shall this bill be indefinitely postponed?" and I would presume, that if it can be shown that it is utterly unnecessary and useless; that it can produce no sensible effect; that, when passed, it will leave its subject-matter precisely as it found it, there is reason enough shown why it should not be passed. It is surely unbecoming the wisdom and dignity of this body to be gravely enacting nugatory laws; or, as some of the gentlemen have termed this, harmless law. The enactment of a law can never be without consequences, for if the law itself means nothing and does nothing as a law, it must injure the reputation of the body enacting it. This brings me then directly to the question, do the gentlemen who insist upon this bill believe that it is, in any manner, necessary to the validity of the convention to which it refers? Does that convention require such a law to give it force and effect? Are we to put the finishing hand to it, without which it is a dead letter? It asks no appropriation of money; it requires no collateral or extrinsic act to be done to enable it to live, and move, and execute its functions. If it be the supreme law of the land, it does of itself all that is necessary for its full consummation; and if it be not the law of the land, what is it? If it be anything it is everything. This treaty has been made, ratified, and exchanged by the President and Senate, in the manner directed by the Constitution. Are gentlemen willing to say, that, notwithstanding this, it still requires our concurrence or confirmation to give it life and validity. Is it no longer a treaty if we shall refuse our concurrence?—for it is manifest that if our refusal will not destroy it, our concurrence cannot help it. It is one indivisible act, and its consequences are equally indivisible. I have an insuperable objection to following gentlemen in the discussion of points not necessary to the full understanding and fair decision of the matter before us, and which necessarily lead us into heated controversies and angry questions. When the aid of this House, by money or otherwise, is called for, in order to carry into execution the provisions, or some of them, of a treaty, which it shall think injurious to the important interests of the country, and it shall be put to us to say, whether we will grant the required assistance, or meet the consequences of a refusal, the House will doubtless take its course with that sound discretion and deliberate judgment which the high, the awful responsibility of the act will demand. They will endeavor to reconcile their Constitutional obligations with the safety and interests of the State. A case of this appalling shape and magnitude may be trusted, and must be trusted with the consciences of those who may be called upon to decide it. Happily, such is not the case we are now acting upon. I, therefore, confidently bring back the question to the gentlemen, and wait their answer, how and in what manner and degree this convention is to be affected by the adoption or rejection of this bill? What influence will it have upon the validity of a contract thus made and concluded, ratified, and exchanged? That the subject-matter of the treaty is within the treaty-making power, can scarcely be denied. Nothing is affected by it but the rate of duties to be paid by the respective parties in their respective ports—as fair and usual a subject of national contracts, or treaties, as can be imagined. If the President and Senate have not power to make treaties of this kind, their power is a mockery; a name without a substance; an authority with nothing upon which it can ever act or be exercised. It is contended by the gentleman from Georgia, that a treaty which affects existing laws upon a subject within the peculiar power of Congress, cannot be carried into operation without the concurrent act of this House; and therefore, that, inasmuch as the imposing or removing of duties is given by the Constitution expressly to Congress, a treaty cannot change a law regulating duties without the aid or concurrence of Congress in its ordinary mode of legislation. But this proposition is doubtless much too broad, and most general propositions are. What is more clearly, decidedly, and exclusively in the power of Congress than the right of declaring war? This must be done by a law of Congress, and can be done in no other way. Yet this law of Congress, made on a subject thus within its exclusive power, may be repealed, and has been repealed, by a Treaty of Peace made by the President and Senate, in the manner prescribed by the Constitution, without any reference to the will or pleasure of this House, any dependence on its authority, or any concurrence of its laws. The treaty is duly made and ratified—peace follows—the war is terminated—the act of Congress declaring war, and all other acts in relation to it repealed, without the least interference of this House, or its opinion upon the subject being even asked or attended to. A treaty must be considered, as it really is, a compact or bargain between two parties, which, once made and concluded in the manner both have agreed to be binding, is no longer in the power of either. If, therefore, this convention has received its ratification in the manner and by the authority prescribed by our Constitution or form of Government, it is at this moment a valid and binding bargain between the two nations, and no longer rightfully in the power of either. If this convention has not been so ratified; that is, if it has not been done in the proper manner and by the proper authority, it is neither a treaty nor a contract, nor anything else; and yet we find the President has exchanged it with the other Power, as a thing done and ratified in due form and with competent authority; and we find he has proclaimed it to the American people and to the world, as a treaty made and ratified, and as the law of the land to be hereafter observed and obeyed. Has the President been premature in all this, and exceeded the Constitutional limits of his authority? Let it be remembered, too, that the public promulgation of this convention as a thing done and concluded, as a bargain made and ratified, as the Constitutional law of the land, was the first knowledge or intimation of its nature or contents received by this House. It came to us in the same manner and at the same time it came to every other citizen of the United States. It was communicated to the Senate, together with all the correspondence and documents relating to it, in secret; it was examined, discussed and decided upon in the Senate in secret; the doors of the chamber were closed upon us; we might have knocked, but should have had no admittance. Does this look like an act requiring our confirmation or aid, or on which we are to be required to pass any judgment? Call first upon the President to furnish you with the necessary information; demand of him to send you the correspondence between the Ministers on this subject, which we are now to pass our vote upon. All this he did for the Senate; and if he has overlooked us, let us remind him of it before we proceed any further. But can a treaty annul an act of Congress? Can it repeal a law? Why not? If a treaty be, as the Constitution expressly declares, a law of the land, and a supreme law, is there anything strange or inconsistent in its repealing another and a prior law? But the prior law, say the gentlemen, was passed and enacted by the three branches of the Government; and this treaty has been made but by two. And what of this, if the same authority, the same Constitution, which gives the three branches power to make a law in general cases, gives the two branches power to make it in this case. If the Constitution declares it to be the law, it must have all the effect of law, by whomsoever made. In the nature of things there cannot exist at the same time, under the same authority, two contradictory, inconsistent laws, or rules of action. One or other must give way; both cannot be obeyed; and if, in this case, the treaty has no Constitutional supremacy over an ordinary act of legislation, it at least has the admitted advantage of being earlier in point of time, of being the last Constitutional expression of the will of the nation on this subject. It is worthy of remark, that the general power of legislation is given to Congress in one part of the Constitution; the special power of making treaties to the President and Senate in another part; and then the acts of both, if constitutionally done, are declared, in the same sentence, in another part of the Constitution, to be the supreme law of the land, and placed precisely upon the same footing of authority. I conclude these hasty undigested remarks, with repeating, that if gentlemen believe, and I have not heard it denied, that the convention will go into operation, and is indeed now in operation, without the aid of the law proposed, it is a sufficient reason why the law should not be passed.

The question on postponement was decided in the negative—yeas 60, nays 81.

The question recurred on agreeing to the amendments made in Committee of the Whole, on which a debate took place the other day. The object of the amendments was to except from the equalization of duties all such British vessels as do not come direct from Europe. The amendments were negatived without a division.

Some other amendments were proposed, one of which was agreed to, viz: to strike out the East Indies from the number of exceptions to the operation of the act.

The question then having been stated, "Shall the bill be engrossed for a third reading?"

Mr. GASTON remarked, that perceiving the general wish to come to a conclusion, on this bill, he had abstained from answering many remarks which had been made in opposition to his motion for indefinite postponement. But as the controversy was revived on the question for engrossing the bill, he would avail himself of the opportunity to rescue his opinions from misconception, and defend them against the most important of the arguments by which they had been assailed. In ascribing to the convention the power of repealing so much of the acts of Congress on the subject of discriminating duties as was opposed to its provisions, he was supposed by gentlemen to contend for a supremacy of the power to make treaties over the power to enact laws. Some seem even to have imagined, that he exalted this power of framing treaties over the Constitution itself. His opinions were founded on no such erroneous principle. He regarded acts of Congress formed on subjects within the jurisdiction of Congress, and treaties formed on subjects proper for treaties, as being equally laws of the nation, and he claimed for neither a superiority over the other. The Constitution vests all the legislative powers which it grants in one organ of the national will, the Congress of the United States. It vests the whole of the power of making treaties in another organ of the national will, the President acting with the concurrence of two thirds of the Senate of the United States. It defines what are the legislative powers granted, because such a definition was necessary to distinguish between those delegated to the General Government and such as were retained by the States. It does not limit the power of making treaties, because no part of this power was to be retained by the States. The entire power therefore on the subject of treaties, which sovereign States, according to the usages and laws of nations, may exercise, unless where it is restricted by specific prohibitions in the Constitution, is vested under this general grant in the proper depository. The Constitution then imparts to proper acts of the legislative authority, and also of the treaty-making power, the character and attributes of "laws," that is, of rules of action prescribed by the sovereign power. They both derive their efficacy from being Constitutional expressions of the will of the nation; and where there are two expressions of that will, which cannot stand together, the last necessarily abrogates the first. A law may repeal a treaty. This was done in the case of the Treaty of 1778, with France, distinctly repealed by an act of Congress. And a treaty for the same reason may also repeal a precedent act of Congress, as must be admitted to be the case of the treaties of peace with Great Britain and the Regency of Algiers, repealing the acts declaring war against those nations.

The idea that, because the legislative power granted to Congress is restricted to certain subjects, therefore the power to make treaties cannot operate on these subjects without legislative aid, seemed to him neither sound logic, nor a construction permitting the treaty power to have any useful effect. Neither a treaty of peace, of alliance, or of commerce, can well be made without affecting some of these subjects. The first usually contains stipulations in regard to captures made or to be made, and indemnities for wrongs suffered. The last must apply directly to the right of regulating commerce with foreign nations; and treaties of alliance specify the aids of men and money to be afforded in the cases prescribed. The power therefore to make treaties, which the Constitution confides exclusively to the President, concurring with two-thirds of the Senate, is essentially annulled by a construction that requires a legislative assent, wherever these treaties operate upon subjects which are the usual well known and legitimate subjects of treaty. For certainly the discretionary power of assenting to or dissenting from any instrument, and thereby giving or refusing it efficacy, is essentially the power to make it. And if this construction obtain, treaties may be said to be prepared by the President and Senate, but they can be made only by Congress.

Mr. G. did not conceive that the opinions he had expressed were liable, when properly understood, to the criticism which had been made by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. BARBOUR;) they did not involve the inconsistency of permitting an act of the entire Legislature to be repealed by the will of a part only of that Legislature. The nation, either in the enactment of laws or in the making of treaties, is always the agent. It is the will of the nation which operates in both instances—though the expression of this will is made through distinct organs to which the functions are respectively confided. Perhaps, too, it will be found that there are salutary checks provided against an erroneous expression of this will, in the one case, as in the other. To acts of legislation, the concurrence of the President is not indispensable. Two-thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives can make laws without his aid. In the formation of treaties he must act, and his act must have the sanction of two-thirds of the Senate. The power of making treaties and that of making laws, and the depositories of these powers should be considered as perfectly distinct from each other, as if the individuals who acted in the one case never had an agency in the other.

It did not follow, however, from his doctrine in regard to the efficacy of treaties, that they necessarily changed or repealed legislative acts, with which they did not entirely accord. The stipulations of a treaty might amount, and often did amount, to no more than a pledge to alter or abrogate these acts, or to make legislative regulations conformable to such stipulations. Where the treaty was of this nature—that is to say, executory merely, legislative aid was necessary. But where it could execute itself, there it needed no aid. What was the nature of the obligation to carry a treaty of the former kind into effect, it was not necessary now to examine. When, however, he stated, on a former occasion, that he viewed this obligation as morally binding on this House, as a branch of the legislative authority, he did not think that he uttered a sentiment which, in the language of the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. KING,) degraded the House of Representatives into a mere chamber for registering the edicts of the President and Senate. He viewed it as a fundamental principle of our Government, that every man, and every body of men in it, owed obedience to the laws of the land. The House of Representatives cannot claim an exemption from this duty. They may aid in repealing laws—but so long as the laws exist, whether they have derived their origin from a legislative or a treaty declaration of the will of the sovereign power, the House of Representatives, the Senate, the President, are bound by them. The obligation to appropriate for treaties, was just as binding as the obligation to appropriate for the objects of existing laws. If the gentleman considered this moral restraint as unfriendly either to personal liberty or to the political freedom of this body, he (Mr. G.) neither wished for himself, or those who were dear to him, a liberty superior to law.

In regard to the practice of Government on similar occasions, the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. FORSYTH) had cited instances which he was not then prepared to examine. Such an examination required a deliberate review of the treaties and acts referred to, which demanded time and books that could not now be commanded. It was possible that some of the cases did prove an unnecessary legislation on subjects which treaties had adequately provided for. But what was the answer to the two prominent and marked cases which Mr. G. had before noticed, viz: the British treaty of 1795, and the convention with the French Republic. In the first there were stipulations abolishing discriminating duties on importations from Canada, yet no act of Congress was passed to give efficacy to these stipulations—the treaty made them law. In the French convention there was a provision for a mutual restriction of captures. Congress, it is said by the gentleman from Georgia, did pass an act in regard to this provision. They indeed did, and this act was the strongest illustration of their entire concurrence in the opinions he had expressed. This act makes an appropriation of money to authorize payment for such of the property as could not be restored in kind; but it pretended not to command such restoration where it was practicable. If the construction of the gentleman had prevailed, the last was necessary. But neither the Congress gave such direction, nor did the President wait for it. He restored the Berceau. According to the exposition which he (Mr. G.) had adopted, the appropriation of money was necessary, because the Constitution prohibits the payment of money without an appropriation.

Mr. G. forbore from going further into the discussion, from a conviction that the House was anxious for the question.

Mr. THROOP said that he did not rise for the purpose of entering into a detailed argument on the question submitted to the House, but merely to state the reasons for the vote he should give; this he deemed due to his friends in this House, because he found himself opposed to the opinions of a majority of them. He should vote against the bill because he thought it unnecessary to pass such a law. The act in question did nothing more than put into the form of a law the several provisions of the treaty regulating the commerce between the two countries, which were of themselves the supreme law of the land. These provisions did not require a construction, nor any aid by law to carry them into execution. If the object was merely to instruct the revenue officers, he would prefer its being done by the President, or the Secretary of the Treasury, whose duty he conceived it to be, and whose competency could not be doubted. He did not know that the passage of this law, following the provisions of the treaty, would do any great mischief, but he was opposed to the principles on which it was attempted to be supported, and feared that it would at some future period form a dangerous precedent. The treaty-making power was lodged by the Constitution in the President and Senate, and their act became obligatory on the nation, without the interference of this House, by that section of the Constitution, which declares that, "this Constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land." An argument has been attempted to be drawn from the fact that the Constitution, laws, and treaties, are classed together in the same sentence, and are all declared to be the law of the land. He said he did not know that he understood what the conclusion was; but if it was as he apprehended it to be, that, being all classed together, and in one sentence declared to be the supreme law, that then a treaty was of no greater force than a law, he did conceive that the same argument would prove that the Constitution was not paramount to a law, and if that construction prevailed, Congress might by law repeal the Constitution. But grant that the treaty had no greater efficacy than a law, and could repeal and be repealed by a law, then the act under consideration was unnecessary, as the treaty, being subsequent to the law creating discriminating duties, repealed that law; and when a new tariff of duties was created it might be made to conform to the treaty. But it is said the treaty is a compact; hence, it is no law to be observed by the people, but only a direction to Congress to pass a law. He said, because it is a compact it is superior to the law. An individual may prescribe to himself a rule of conduct, by which he will be governed, but he may depart from that rule whenever he pleases; it is a law to himself, and the power which enacts may repeal. But if he stipulates with another a rule of conduct to be observed by himself, it is a compact, and he cannot depart from it without a violation of his plighted faith, and the rights of that other. This is the distinction between a treaty and a law, and which renders a treaty paramount to the law; the law prescribes a rule of conduct to the citizens of the State, by which they are to be governed, and may be repealed at any time; but a treaty is a compact between two sovereign States, which cannot be departed from by one without violating the faith of that State, and the rights of the other. He said, that an answer to the argument that the treaty is only a direction to Congress to pass a law, was to be found in the concluding part of the same section of the Constitution, which, after stating that treaties, &c. shall be the supreme law of the land, adds: "and the judges in each State shall be bound thereby." Here was a direction not to Congress, but to the courts of law, to construe and enforce the treaty, which they were bound to do without reference to any construction which might be put upon it by an act of this body. He trusted he should not be told that this direction was to the judges of the State courts, and not to the judiciary of the United States, and that a treaty might be enforced in the State courts, but would require a law to enforce it in the courts of the United States. For, according to that construction it might produce this absurdity, that the treaty would operate upon the States individually, and Congress might refuse to pass a law whereby it could not be treated as a law by the United States' courts. He said, that he could not sanction the idea that this House had any control over the treaty-making power, to ratify or annul their acts, unless it was in cases where the treaty could not execute itself, but required for that purpose provision to be made by law, such as raising money, &c. Some gentlemen seem alarmed lest the President and Senate, by an assumption of power, should at length claim the right of making war, which they could do by stipulating for war in a treaty. He said, should the right of declaring war exist in one branch of the Legislature independent of the others, he could not but see but it might as safely be lodged with the President and Senate, as with this House. The right here claimed of supervising the treaty, would lead to that result. War has ceased; we are at peace with Great Britain, by treaty; but if this House, in the plenitude of their wisdom, had not thought proper to ratify the treaty, the war is renewed; we must resume our arms, which would effectually vest this branch of the Legislature with the power of making war. He said he did not believe that it entered into the views of the framers of the Constitution to vest this House with the power of rejecting or ratifying a treaty; if it did, they would not have left a power so important to be gathered from inference. They would have made express provision for it. It would have been easy for them, and they would have declared that the power of making treaties should be vested in the President of the United States and Congress.

The bill was further opposed by Mr. PICKERING, and Mr. MILLS, and advocated by Mr. KING of Massachusetts, and Mr. LOWNDES.

The yeas and nays having been required by Mr. ROOT, on motion, the subject was further postponed until to-morrow.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. CALHOUN, from the committee on that part of the President's Message which relates to an Uniform National Currency, reported a bill to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

The bill is as follows:

A Bill to incorporate the Subscribers to the Bank of the United States.

Be it enacted, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That a Bank of the United States of America shall be established, with a capital of thirty-five millions of dollars, divided into three hundred and fifty thousand shares, of one hundred dollars each share; but Congress may, at any time hereafter, augment the capital of the said bank, to a sum not exceeding fifty millions of dollars, in such manner as shall be by law provided. Seventy thousand shares, amounting to the sum of seven millions of dollars, part of the capital of the said bank, shall be subscribed, and paid for by the United States, in the manner hereinafter specified; and two hundred and eighty thousand shares, amounting to the sum of twenty-eight millions of dollars, shall be subscribed and paid for, by individuals, companies, or corporations, in the manner hereinafter specified.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That subscriptions for the sum of twenty-eight millions of dollars, towards constituting the capital of the said bank, shall be opened on the first Monday in June next, at the following places, that is to say : at Portsmouth, in the State of New Hampshire ; at Boston, in the State of Massachusetts ; at Providence, in the State of Rhode Island ; at New Haven, in the State of Connecticut ; at Burlington, in the State of Vermont ; at New York, in the State of New York ; at —, in the State of New Jersey ; at Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania ; at Wilmington, in the State of Delaware ; at Baltimore, in the State of Maryland ; at Richmond, in the State of Virginia ; at Lexington, in the State of Kentucky ; at —, in the State of Ohio ; at Raleigh, in the State of North Carolina ; at Nashville, in the State of Tennessee ; at Charleston, in the State of South Carolina ; at Augusta, in the State of Georgia ; at New Orleans, in the State of Louisiana ; and at Washington, in the District of Columbia. And the said subscriptions shall be opened under the superintendence of three commissioners, to be appointed at, and for, each of the said places, by the President of the United States, (who is hereby authorized to make such appointments,) and shall continue open every day, from the time of opening the same, between the hours of ten o'clock in the forenoon, and four o'clock in the afternoon, until the Saturday following, at four o'clock in the afternoon, when the same shall be closed ; and immediately thereafter, the commissioners, or any two of them, at the respective places aforesaid, shall cause two transcripts or copies of such subscriptions to be made, one of which they shall send to the Secretary of the Treasury, one they shall retain, and the original they shall transmit, within seven days from the closing of the subscriptions as aforesaid, to the commissioners at Philadelphia aforesaid. And on the receipt of the said original subscriptions, or of either of the said copies thereof, if the original be lost, mislaid, or detained, the commissioners at Philadelphia aforesaid, or a majority of them, shall immediately thereafter convene, and proceed to take an account of the said subscriptions. And if more than the amount of twenty-eight millions of dollars shall have been subscribed, then the said last mentioned commissioners shall apportion the same among the several subscribers, according to their several respective subscriptions, allowing and apportioning to each subscriber at least one share. And in case the aggregate amount of the said subscriptions shall exceed twenty-eight millions of dollars, the said last mentioned commissioners, after having apportioned the same as aforesaid, shall cause lists of the said apportioned subscriptions to be made out, including in each list the apportioned subscription for the place where the original subscription was made, one of which lists they shall transmit to the commissioners, or one of them, under whose superintendence such subscriptions were originally made, that the subscribers may thereby ascertain the number of shares to them respectively apportioned as aforesaid. And in case the aggregate amount of the said subscriptions made, during the period aforesaid, at all the places aforesaid, shall not amount to twenty-eight millions of dollars, the subscriptions to complete the said sum shall be, and remain open, at Philadelphia aforesaid, under the superintendence of the commissioners appointed for that place ; and the subscriptions may be then made by any individual, company, or corporation, for any number of shares, not exceeding in the whole the amount required to complete the said sum of twenty-eight millions of dollars.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for any individual, company, or corporation, when the subscriptions shall be opened, as herein before directed, to subscribe for any number of shares of the capital of the said bank, not exceeding three thousand shares ; and the sums so subscribed shall be payable, and paid in the manner following, that is, to say : seven millions of dollars thereof in gold or silver coin of the United States, or in foreign gold or silver coin, at the value thereof, as heretofore established by an act, entitled "An act regulating the currency of foreign coins," passed the tenth day of April, in the year one thousand eight hundred and six ; and twenty-one millions of dollars thereof in like gold or silver coin, or in the funded debt of the United States, contracted at the time of the subscriptions respectively. And the payments made in the funded debt of the United States shall be paid and received at the following rates, that is to say : the funded debt, bearing an interest of six per centum per annum, at the nominal or par value thereof ; the funded debt bearing an interest of three per centum per annum, at the rate of sixty-five dollars for every sum of one hundred dollars of the nominal amount thereof ; and the funded debt, bearing an interest of seven per centum per annum, at the rate of one hundred and six dollars and fifty-one cents ; for every sum of one hundred dollars of the nominal amount thereof ; together with the amount of the interest accrued on the said several denominations of funded debt, to be computed and allowed to the time of subscribing the same to the capital of the said bank as aforesaid. And the payments of the said subscriptions shall be made and completed by the subscribers, respectively, at the times and in the manner following, that is to say : at the time of subscribing, there shall be paid five dollars on each share, in gold or silver coin as aforesaid, and twenty-five dollars more, in coin as aforesaid, or in funded debt as aforesaid ; at the expiration of six calendar months after the time of subscribing, there shall be paid the further sum of five dollars on each share, in gold or silver coin as aforesaid, and twenty-five dollars more, in coin as aforesaid, or in funded debt as aforesaid ; at the expiration of twelve calendar months from the time of subscribing, there shall be paid the further sum of five dollars on each share, in gold or silver coin as aforesaid, and twenty-five dollars more, in coin as aforesaid, or in funded debt as aforesaid ; and at the expiration of eighteen calendar months, there shall be paid the further sum of ten dollars in gold or silver coin as aforesaid.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That, at the time of subscribing to the capital of the said bank as aforesaid, each and every subscriber shall deliver to the commissioners, at the place of subscribing, as well the amount of their subscriptions, respectively, in coin as aforesaid, as the certificates of funded debt, for the funded debt proportion of their respective subscriptions, together with a power of attorney, authorizing the said commissioners, or a majority of them, to transfer the said stock in due form of law, to "the president, directors, and company, of the Bank of the United States of America," as soon as the said bank shall be organized. Provided, always, That if, in consequence of the apportionment of the shares in the capital of the said bank among the subscribers, in the case and in the manner hereinbefore provided, any subscribers shall have delivered to the commissioners, at the time of subscribing, a greater amount of gold or silver coin and funded debt, than shall be necessary to complete the payments for the share or shares to such subscribers, apportioned as aforesaid, the commissioners shall only retain so much of the said gold or silver coin, and funded debt, as shall be necessary to complete such payments, and shall forthwith return the surplus thereof, on application for the same, to the subscribers lawfully entitled thereto. And the commissioners, respectively, shall deposit the gold and silver coin, and certificates of public debt, by them respectively received as aforesaid, from the subscribers to the capital of the said bank, in some place of secure and safe keeping, so that the same may, and shall be specifically delivered and transferred, as the same were by them respectively received, to the president, directors, and company of the Bank of the United States of America, or to their order, as soon as shall be required after the organization of the said bank. And the said commissioners, appointed to superintend the subscriptions to the capital of the said bank as aforesaid, shall receive a reasonable compensation for their services, respectively, and shall be allowed all reasonable charges and expenses incurred in the execution of their trust, to be paid by the president, directors, and company of the bank, out of the funds thereof.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the United States to pay and redeem the funded debt subscribed to the capital of the said bank, at the rates aforesaid, in such sums and at such times as shall be deemed expedient, anything in any act or acts of Congress to the contrary thereof, notwithstanding. And it shall also be lawful for the president, directors, and company, of the said bank, to sell and transfer, for gold and silver coin or bullion, the funded debt subscribed to the capital of the said bank as aforesaid: Provided, always, That they shall not sell more thereof than the sum of two millions of dollars in any one year; nor sell any part thereof at any time within the United States, without previously giving notice of their intention, to the Secretary of the Treasury, and offering the same to the United States at the current price, not exceeding the rates aforesaid.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That, at the opening of the subscription to the capital stock of the said bank, the Secretary of the Treasury shall subscribe, or cause to be subscribed, on behalf of the United States, the said number of seven thousand shares, amounting to seven millions of dollars, as aforesaid, to be paid in gold or silver coin, or Treasury notes, or in stock of the United States, bearing interest at the rate of six per centum per annum, in seven equal annual payments of one million of dollars each, the first whereof shall be made at, or as nearly as conveniently may be after, the opening of the said subscriptions: Provided, always, That it shall be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approbation of the President of the United States, and the consent of the president, directors, and company of the said bank, to anticipate and pay in advance, all or any of the said annual payments, at such times, and in such manner, as shall be mutually stipulated and agreed.

And if payment thereof, or of any part thereof, be made in public stock, bearing interest at the rate of six per centum per annum, as aforesaid, the said interest shall be payable quarterly, to commence from the time of making such payment on account of the said subscriptions, and the principal of the said stock shall be redeemable in any sums, and at any periods which the Government shall deem fit. And the Secretary of the Treasury shall, from time to time, cause the certificates of such public stock to be prepared, and made in the usual form, and shall pay and deliver the same to the president, directors, and company of the said bank, at or as soon as conveniently may be after, the time and times, hereinbefore prescribed for the payment of the said subscription of the United States, to the capital of the said bank as aforesaid; or at such other time and times as may be agreed upon in pursuance of the authority hereinbefore given, to anticipate the payments of the said subscription as aforesaid. And if payment of the said subscription of the United States to the capital of the said bank as aforesaid, or of any part thereof, shall be made in Treasury notes, such Treasury notes shall not bear interest, but shall pass by endorsement, or by delivery, for such sum, to be specified on the face thereof, respectively, as the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approbation of the President of the United States, shall direct; and shall be receivable in all payments to the United States, and in all payments to the president, directors, and company, of the said bank. And the Secretary of the Treasury shall, from time to time, cause the said Treasury notes to be prepared, and shall pay and deliver the same to the president, directors, and company, of the said bank, at or as soon as conveniently may be after, the time and times hereinbefore prescribed, for the payment of the said subscription of the United States, to the capital of the said bank as aforesaid; or at such other time and times as may be agreed upon, in pursuance of the authority hereinbefore given, to anticipate the payments of the said subscription as aforesaid. And it shall be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury, or for the president, directors, and company, of the said bank, to issue, and reissue, at their par value, such of the said Treasury notes as shall be received in payments by the United States, or by the said bank, respectively, as aforesaid: Provided, always, That the United States may at any time redeem and cancel the said Treasury notes, or any part thereof, while the same shall be in the possession of the said bank as the property thereof: And provided, also, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, out of the said Treasury notes received in payments to the United States, as aforesaid, to cause a portion thereof to be cancelled yearly, and every year, so that the whole amount issued may be redeemed and cancelled on or before the expiration of eight years from the time of opening the subscription to the capital of the said bank as aforesaid.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall falsely make, forge, or counterfeit, or cause or procure to be falsely made, forged, or counterfeited, or willingly aid or assist in falsely making, forging, or counterfeiting, any note in imitation of, or purporting to be a Treasury note as aforesaid; or shall falsely alter, or cause or procure to be falsely altered, or willingly aid or assist in falsely altering, any Treasury note issued as aforesaid; or shall pass, utter, or publish as true, any false, forged, or counterfeit note, purporting to be a Treasury note as aforesaid, knowing the same to be falsely made, forged, or counterfeited; or shall pass, utter, or publish, or attempt to pass, utter, or publish as true, any falsely altered Treasury note issued as aforesaid, knowing the same to be falsely altered; or shall be, directly or indirectly, knowingly concerned in any of the offences aforesaid, every such person shall be deemed and adjudged guilty of felony; and being thereof convicted by due course of law, shall be sentenced to be imprisoned, and kept to hard labor, for a period not less than three years, nor more than ten years, and be fined in a sum not exceeding five thousand dollars.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the subscribers to the said Bank of the United States of America, their successors and assigns, shall be, and are hereby, created a corporation and body politic, by the name and style of "The President, Directors, and Company, of the Bank of the United States," and shall so continue until the third day of March, in the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, and by that name shall be, and are hereby, made able and capable, in law, to have, purchase, receive, possess, enjoy, and retain, to them and their successors, lands, rents, tenements, hereditaments, goods, chattels, and effects, of whatsoever kind, nature, and quality, to an amount not exceeding, in the whole, fifty-five millions of dollars, including the amount of the capital stock aforesaid; and the same to sell, grant, demise, alien or dispose of; to sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, answer and be answered, defend and be defended, in all courts and places whatsoever; and also to make, have, and use a common seal, and the same to break, alter, and renew, at their pleasure; and also to ordain, establish, and put in execution such by-laws and ordinances and regulations as they shall deem necessary and convenient for the government of the said corporation, not being contrary to the Constitution and laws of the United States; and generally to do and execute all and singular the acts, matters, and things which to them it shall or may appertain to do; subject, nevertheless, to the rules, regulations, restrictions, limitations, and provisions, hereinafter prescribed and declared.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That, for the management of the affairs of the said corporation, there shall be twenty-five directors, five of whom shall be annually appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and twenty of whom shall be annually elected at the banking house in the city of Philadelphia, on the first Monday of January, in each year, by the qualified stockholders of the capital of the said bank, and by a plurality of votes then and there actually given, according to the scale of voting hereinafter prescribed. And the directors, so duly appointed and elected, shall be capable of serving, by virtue of such appointment and choice, from the first Monday in the month of January of each year, until the end and expiration of the first Monday in the month of January of the year next ensuing the time of each annual election to be held by the stockholders as aforesaid. And the board of directors, annually, at the first meeting after their election in each and every year, shall proceed to elect one of the five directors appointed by the President of the United States, to be president of the corporation, who shall hold the said office during the same period for which the directors are appointed and elected as aforesaid: Provided, always, That the first appointment and election of the directors and president of the said bank shall be at the time and for the period hereinafter declared: And provided, also, That in case it should at any time happen that an appointment or election of directors, or an election of the president of the said bank, should not be so made as to take effect on any day when, in pursuance of this act, they ought to take effect, the said corporation shall not, for that cause, be deemed to be dissolved; but it shall be lawful, at any other time, to make such appointments, and to hold such elections, (as the case may be,) and the manner of holding the elections shall be regulated by the by-laws and ordinances of the said corporation; and until such appointments or elections be made, the directors and president of the said bank, for the time being, shall continue in office: And provided, also, That in case of the death, resignation, or removal of the president of the said corporation, the directors shall proceed to elect another president from the directors appointed by the President of the United States as aforesaid; and in case of the death, resignation, or absence from the United States, or removal, of a director from office, the vacancy shall be supplied by the President of the United States, or by the stockholders, as the case may be. But the President of the United States alone shall have power to remove the president of the bank, or any of the directors appointed by him as aforesaid.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That as soon as the sum of eight millions four hundred thousand dollars, in gold and silver coin, and in the public debt, shall have been actually received on account of the subscriptions to the capital of the said bank, (exclusively of the subscription aforesaid, on the part of the United States,) notice thereof shall be given by the persons under whose superintendence the subscriptions shall have been made at the city of Philadelphia, in at least two newspapers printed in each of the places, (if so many be printed at such places respectively,) where subscriptions shall have been made, and the said persons shall, at the same time, and in like manner, notify a time and place within the said city of Philadelphia, at the distance of at least thirty days from the time of such notification, for proceeding to the election of twenty directors as aforesaid, and it shall be lawful for such election to be then and there made. And the President of the United States is hereby authorized, during the present session of Congress, to nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint five directors of the said bank; and the persons who shall be elected and appointed as aforesaid, shall be the first directors of the said bank, and shall proceed to elect one of the five directors appointed by the President of the United States as aforesaid, to be president of the said bank; and the directors and president of the said bank, so appointed and elected as aforesaid, shall be capable of serving in their respective offices, by virtue thereof, until the end and expiration of the first Monday of the month of January next ensuing the said appointments and elections; and they shall then and thenceforth commence and continue the operations of the said bank, at the city of Philadelphia.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That the directors for the time being shall have power to appoint such officers, clerks, and servants under them, as shall be necessary for executing the business of the said corporation, and to allow them such compensation for their services, respectively, as shall be reasonable; and shall be capable of exercising such other powers and authorities, for the well governing and ordering of the officers of the said corporation, as shall be prescribed, fixed, and determined by the laws, regulations, and ordinances of the same.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That the following rules, restrictions, limitations, and provisions shall form and be fundamental articles of the constitution of the said corporation, to wit:

JANUARY, 1816.

Bank of the United States.

H. OF R.

1. The number of votes to which the stockholders shall be entitled, in voting for directors, shall be according to the number of shares he, she, or they, respectively, shall hold, in the proportions following, that is to say: for one share, and not more than two shares, one vote; for every two shares above two, and not exceeding ten, one vote; for every four shares above ten, and not exceeding thirty, one vote; for every six shares above thirty, and not exceeding sixty, one vote; for every eight shares above sixty, and not exceeding one hundred, one vote; and for every ten shares above one hundred, one vote; but no person, copartnership, or body politic, shall be entitled to a greater number than thirty votes; and after the first election no share or shares shall confer a right of voting, which shall not have been holden three calendar months previous to the day of election. And stockholders actually resident within the United States, and none other, may vote in elections by proxy. But no person shall give, in the whole, a greater number of votes, as proxy, and in his own right, than he would be entitled to give in his own right only, according to the proportion of voting hereinafter prescribed.

2. Not more than three-fourths of the directors elected by the stockholders, and not more than four-fifths of the directors appointed by the President of the United States, who shall be in office at the time of an annual election, shall be elected or appointed for the next succeeding year; but the director who shall be the president at the time of an election may always be reappointed by the President of the United States, and be re-elected president of the bank by the directors thereof.

3. None but a resident citizen of the United States shall be a director, nor shall a director be entitled to any emolument, but the stockholders may make such compensation to the president, for his extraordinary attendance at the bank, as shall appear to them reasonable.

4. Not less than seven directors shall constitute a board for the transaction of business, of whom the president shall always be one, except in case of sickness or necessary absence, in which case his place may be supplied by any other director whom he, by writing, under his hand, shall depute for that purpose. And the director so deputed may do and transact all the necessary business belonging to the office of the president of the said corporation, during the continuance of the sickness or necessary absence of the president.

5. A number of stockholders, not less than sixty, who, together, shall be proprietors of one thousand shares or upwards, shall have power at any time to call a general meeting of the stockholders, for purposes relative to the institution, giving at least ten weeks' notice in two public newspapers of the place where the bank is seated, and specifying in such notice the object or objects of such meeting.

6. Each cashier or treasurer, before he enters upon the duties of his office, shall be required to give bond, with two or more sureties, to the satisfaction of the directors, in a sum not less than fifty thousand dollars, with a condition for his good behaviour, and the faithful performance of his duties to the corporation.

7. The lands, tenements, and hereditaments, which it shall be lawful for the said corporation to hold, shall be only such as shall be requisite for its immediate accommodation in relation to the convenient transacting of its business, and such as shall have been bona fide mortgaged to it by way of security, or conveyed to it in satisfaction of debts previously contracted in the course of its dealings, or purchased at sales, upon judgments which shall have been obtained for such debts.

8. The total amount of debts which the said corporation shall at any time owe, whether by bond, bill, note, or other contract, over and above the debt or debts due for money deposited in the bank, shall not exceed the sum of fifty millions of dollars, unless the contracting of any greater debt shall have been previously authorized by a law of the United States. In case of excess, the directors under whose administration it shall happen, shall be liable for the same in their natural and private capacities; and an action of debt may in such case be brought against them, or any of them, their or any of their heirs, executors, or administrators, in any court of record of the United States, or either of them, by any creditor or creditors of the said corporation, and may be prosecuted to judgment and execution, any condition, covenant, or agreement to the contrary notwithstanding. But this provision shall not be construed to exempt the said corporation, or the lands, tenements, goods, or chattels of the same, from being also liable for, and chargeable with, the said excess.

Such of the said directors, who may have been absent when the said excess was contracted or created, or who may have dissented from the resolution or act whereby the same was so contracted or created, may respectively exonerate themselves from being so liable, by forthwith giving notice of the fact, and of their absence or dissent, to the President of the United States, and to the stockholders, at a general meeting, which they shall have power to call for that purpose.

9. The said corporation shall not, directly or indirectly, deal or trade in anything except bills of exchange, gold or silver bullion, or in the sale of goods really and truly pledged for money lent and not redeemed in due time, or goods which shall be the proceeds of its lands. It shall not be at liberty to purchase any public debt whatsoever; nor shall it take more than at the rate of six per centum per annum for or upon its loans or discounts.

10. No loan shall be made by the said corporation for the use or on account of the Government of the United States, to an amount exceeding five hundred thousand dollars, or of any particular State to an amount exceeding fifty thousand dollars, or of any foreign prince or State, unless previously authorized by a law of the United States.

11. The stock of the said corporation shall be assignable and transferable according to such rules as shall be instituted in that behalf, by the laws and ordinances of the same.

12. The bills obligatory and of credit, under the seal of the said corporation, which shall be made to any person or persons, shall be assignable by endorsement thereupon, under the hand or hands of such person or persons, and his, her, or their executors or administrators, and of his or their assignee or assignees, and so as absolutely to transfer and vest the property thereof in each and every assignee or assignees successively, and to enable such assignee or assignees, and his, her, or their executors or administrators, to maintain an action thereupon in his, her, or their own name or names. And the bills or notes which may be issued by order of the said corporation, signed by the president, and countersigned by the principal cashier or treasurer thereof, promising the payment of money to any person or persons, his, her, or their order, or to bearer, although not under the seal of the said corporation, shall be binding and obligatory upon the same, in like manner, and with like force and effect, as upon any private person or persons, if issued by him, her, or them, in his, her, or their private or natural capacity or capacities, and shall be assignable and negotiable in like manner as if they were so issued by such private person or persons, that is to say: those which shall be payable to any person or persons, his, her, or their order, shall be assignable by endorsement, in like manner, and with the like effect as foreign bills of exchange now are; and those which are payable to bearer shall be assignable and negotiable by delivery only.

13. Half yearly dividends shall be made of so much of the profits of the bank as shall appear to the directors advisable; and once in every three years the directors shall lay before the stockholders, at a general meeting, for their information, an exact and particular statement of the debts which shall have remained unpaid, after the expiration of the original credit, for a period of treble the term of that credit, and of the surplus of the profits, if any, after deducting losses and dividends. If there shall be a failure in the payment of any part of any sum subscribed to the capital of the said bank, by any person, copartnership, or body politic, the party failing shall lose the benefit of any dividend which may have accrued prior to the time for making such payment, and during the delay of the same.

14. The directors of the said corporation shall establish a competent office of discount and deposite in the District of Columbia, whenever any law of the United States shall require such an establishment; and it shall be lawful for the directors of the said corporation to establish offices wheresoever they shall think fit, within the United States or the Territories thereof, and to commit the management of the said offices, and the business thereof, respectively, to such persons, and under such regulations, as they shall deem proper, not being contrary to law or the constitution of the bank. Or, instead of establishing such offices, it shall be lawful for the directors of the said corporation, from time to time to employ any other bank or banks, to be first approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, at any place or places that they may deem safe and proper, to manage and transact the business proposed, as aforesaid, to be managed and transacted by such offices, under such agreements, and subject to such regulations as they shall deem just and proper. Thirteen managers or directors, of every office established as aforesaid, shall be annually appointed by the directors of the bank, to serve one year; they shall choose a president from their own number, each of them shall be a citizen of the United States, and not more than three-fourths of the said managers or directors, in office at the time of an annual appointment, shall be reappointed for the next succeeding year; but the president may be always reappointed.

15. The officer at the head of the Treasury Department of the United States shall be furnished, from time to time, as often as he may require, not exceeding once a week, with statements of the amount of the capital stock of the said corporation, and of the debts due to the same; of the moneys deposited therein; of the notes in circulation; and of the specie in hand; and shall have a right to inspect such general accounts in the books of the bank as shall relate to the said statement: Provided, That this shall not be construed to imply a right of inspecting the account of any private individual or individuals with the bank.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That if the said corporation, or any person or persons, for, or to the use of the same, shall deal or trade in buying or selling goods, wares, merchandise, or commodities, whatsoever, contrary to the provisions of this act, all and every person and persons, by whom any order or direction for so dealing or trading, shall have been given; and all and every person and persons who shall have been concerned as parties or agents therein, shall forfeit and lose treble the value of the goods, wares, merchandises, and commodities, in which such dealing and trade shall have been, one-half thereof to the use of the informer, and the other half thereof to the use of the United States, to be recovered in any action of law, with costs of suit.

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That if the said corporation shall advance, or lend any sum of money, for the use, or on account of the Government of the United States, to an amount exceeding five hundred thousand dollars; or of any particular State, to an amount exceeding fifty thousand dollars; or of any foreign prince or State, (unless previously authorized thereto by a law of the United States,) all and every person and persons, by and with whose order, agreement, consent, approbation, and connivance, such unlawful advance or loan shall have been made, upon conviction thereof, shall forfeit and pay, for every such offence, treble the value or amount of the sum or sums which have been so unlawfully advanced or lent, one-fifth thereof to the use of the informer, and the residue thereof to the use of the United States.

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That the bills or notes of the said corporation, originally made payable, or which shall have become payable, on demand, shall be receivable in all payments to the United States, unless otherwise directed by act of Congress.

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That during the continuance of this act, and whenever required by the Secretary of the Treasury, the said corporation shall give the necessary facilities for transferring the public funds from place to place, and for distributing the same in payment of the public creditors, without charging commissions, or claiming allowance, on account of difference of exchange, and shall also do and perform the several and respective duties of the commissioners of loans for the several States, or of any one or more of them, at the times, in the manner, and upon the terms, prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 18. And be it further enacted, That the said corporation shall not, at any time, suspend, or refuse to pay, the notes thereof, in gold or silver coin, upon demand, according to the contract and promise of such notes: Provided always, nevertheless, That upon the representation of the said corporation, Congress shall have power to authorize the suspension or refusal aforesaid, for a time to be limited by law; and that during the recess of Congress it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, upon a like representation, to authorize such suspension for a term which shall not exceed six weeks after the opening of the next ensuing session of Congress.

SEC. 19. And be it further enacted, That in consideration of the exclusive privileges and benefits conferred by this act, upon the said bank, the President

Directors, and Company thereof, shall pay to the United States, out of the corporate funds thereof, the sum of one million and five hundred thousand dollars, in three equal payments, that is to say: five hundred thousand dollars at the expiration of two years, five hundred thousand dollars at the expiration of three years, and five hundred thousand dollars at the expiration of four years, after the said bank shall be organized and commence its operations, in the manner hereinbefore provided.

SEC. 20. And be it further enacted, That no other bank shall be established by any future law of the United States, during the continuance of the corporation hereby created, for which the faith of the United States is hereby pledged: Provided, Congress may renew existing charters for banks in the District of Columbia, not increasing the capital thereof; and may grant charters, if they deem it expedient, to any banking associations now in operation in the said District, and renew the same, not increasing the capital thereof. And, notwithstanding the expiration of the term for which the said corporation is created, it shall be lawful to use the corporate name, style, and capacity, for the purpose of suits, for the final settlement and liquidation of the affairs and accounts of the corporation, and for the sale and disposition of their estate, real, personal, and mixed; but not for any other purpose, or in any other manner whatsoever, nor for a period exceeding two years after the expiration of the said term of incorporation.

Accompanying the bill was the following letter, and plan of a National Bank, from the Secretary of the Treasury:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Dec. 24, 1815.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, dated the 23d instant, informing me "that the committee on so much of the President's Message as relates to the national currency had determined that a National Bank is the most certain means of restoring to the nation a specie circulation," and had directed you to obtain the opinion of this Department on the following points:

1st. The amount and composition of the capital of the bank.

2d. The government of the bank.

3d. The privileges and duties of the bank.

4th. The organization and operation of the bank.

5th. The bonus to be required for the charter of the bank.

6th. The measures which may aid the bank in commencing and maintaining its operations in specie.

It affords much satisfaction to find that the policy of establishing a National Bank has received the sanction of the committee, and the decision, in this respect, renders it unnecessary to enter into a comparative examination of the superior advantages of such an institution for the attainment of the objects contemplated by the Legislature. Referring, therefore, to the outline of a National Bank, which is subjoined to this letter, as the result of an attentive consideration bestowed upon the subjects of your inquiry, I proceed, with deference and respect, to offer some explanation of the principles upon which the system is founded.

I. It is proposed that, under a charter for twenty years, the capital of the National Bank shall amount to $35,000,000; that Congress shall retain the power to raise it to $50,000,000, and that it shall consist three-quarters of public stock, and one-quarter of gold and silver.

1st. With respect to the amount of the capital.—The services to be performed by the capital of the bank are important, various, and extensive. They will be required through a period almost as long as is usually assigned to a generation. They will be required for the accommodation of the Government, in the collection and distribution of its revenue, as well as for the uses of commerce, agriculture, manufactures, and the arts, throughout the Union. They will be required to restore and maintain the national currency; and, in short, they will be required, under every change of circumstances, in a season of war, as well as in the season of peace, for the circulation of the national wealth, which augments with a rapidity beyond the reach of ordinary calculation.

In the performance of these national services the local and incidental co-operation of the State banks may undoubtedly be expected; but it is the object of the present measure to create an independent, though not a discordant, institution; and while the Government is granting a monopoly for twenty years, it would seem to be improvident and dangerous to rely upon gratuitous or casual aids for the enjoyment of those benefits, which can be effectually secured by positive stipulation.

Nor is it believed that any public inconvenience can possibly arise from the proposed amount of the capital of the bank with its augmentable quality. The amount may, indeed, be a clog upon the profits of the institution, but it can never be employed for any injurious purpose, (not even for the purpose of discount accommodation beyond the fair demand,) without an abuse of trust, which cannot, in candor, be anticipated, or which, if anticipated, may be made an object of penal responsibility.

The competition which exists at present among the State banks will, it is true, be extended to the National Bank; but competition does not imply hostility. The commercial interests and the personal associations of the stockholders will generally be the same in the State banks and in the National Bank. The directors of both institutions will naturally be taken from the same class of citizens. And experience has shown not only the policy, but the existence of those sympathies by which the intercourse of a National Bank and the State banks has been, and always ought to be, regulated, for their common credit and security. At the present crisis it will be peculiarly incumbent upon the National Bank, as well as the Treasury, to conciliate the State banks; to confide to them, liberally, a participation in the deposits of public revenue, and to encourage them in every reasonable effort to resume the payment of their notes in coin. But, independent of these considerations, it is to be recollected that when portions of the capital of the National Bank shall be transferred to its branches, the amount invested in each branch will not, probably, exceed the amount of the capital of any of the principal State banks, and will certainly be less than the amount of the combined capital of the State banks, operating in any of the principal commercial cities. The whole number of the banking establishments in the United States may be stated at two hundred and sixty, and the aggregate amount of their capitals may be estimated at eighty millions of dollars; but the services of the National Bank are also required in every State and Territory, and the capital proposed is thirty-five millions, of which only one-fourth part will consist of gold and silver.

2d. With respect to the composition of the capital of the bank.—There does not prevail much diversity of opinion upon the proposition to form a compound capital for the National Bank, partly of public stock, and partly of coin. The proportions now suggested appear also to be free from any important objections. Under all the regulations of the charter, it is believed that the amount of gold and silver required will afford an adequate supply for commencing and continuing the payments of the bank in current coin; while the power which the bank will possess to convert its stock portion of capital into bullion or coin, from time to time, is calculated to provide for any probable augmentation of the demand. This object being sufficiently secured, the capital of the bank is next to be employed, in perfect consistency with the general interests and safety of the institution, to raise the value of the public securities, by withdrawing almost one-fifth of the amount from the ordinary stock market. Nor will the bank be allowed to expose the public to the danger of a depreciation, by returning any part of the stock to the market, until it has been offered, at the current price, to the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund; and it is not an inconsiderable advantage, in the growing state of the public revenue, that the stock subscribed to the capital of the bank will become redeemable at the pleasure of the Government.

The subscription to the capital of the bank is opened to every species of funded stock. The estimate that the revenues of 1816 and 1817 will enable the Treasury to discharge the whole of the Treasury note debt, furnishes the only reason for omitting to authorize a subscription in that species of debt. Thus,

The old and new six per cent. stocks are receivable at par.

The seven per cent. stock, upon a valuation referring to the 30th of September, 1816, is receivable at 106.51 dollars per cent.

The three per cent. stock, which can only be redeemed for its nominal or certificate value, may be estimated, under all circumstances, to be worth about sixty-two per cent. when the six per cent. stock is at par; but as it is desirable to accomplish the redemption of this stock upon equitable terms, it is made receivable at sixty-five per cent., the rate sanctioned by the Government, and in part accepted by the stockholders in the year 1807.

Of the instalments for paying the subscriptions, it is only necessary to observe that they are regulated by a desire to reconcile an early commencement of the operations of the bank with the existing difficulties in the currency, and with the convenience of the subscribers. In one of the modes proposed for discharging the subscription of the Government, it is particularly contemplated to aid the bank with a medium which cannot fail to alleviate the first pressure for payments in coin.

II. It is proposed that the National Bank shall be governed by twenty-five directors, and each of its branches by thirteen directors; that the President of the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint five of the directors of the bank, one of whom shall be chosen as president of the bank by the board of directors; that the resident stockholders shall elect twenty of the directors of the National Bank, who shall be resident citizens of the United States, and that the National Bank shall appoint the directors of each branch, (being resident citizens of the United States,) one of whom shall be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approbation of the President of the United States, to be president of the branch bank.

The participation of the President and Senate of the United States in the appointment of directors, appears to be the only feature in the proposition for the Government of the National Bank which requires an explanatory remark.

Upon general principles, wherever a pecuniary interest is to be effected by the operations of a public institution, a representative authority ought to be recognised. The United States will be the proprietors of one-fifth of the capital of the bank, and in that proportion, upon general principles, they should be represented in the direction. But an apprehension has sometimes been expressed lest the power of the Government thus inserted into the administration of the affairs of the bank should be employed eventually to alienate the funds, and to destroy the credit of the institution. Whatever may have been the fate of banks in other countries, subject to forms of Government essentially different, there can be no reasonable cause for apprehension here. Independent of the obvious improbability of the attempt, the Government of the United States cannot, by any legislative or executive act, impair the rights, or multiply the obligations of a corporation constitutionally established, as long as the independence and integrity of the judicial power shall be maintained. Whatever accommodation the Treasury may have occasion to ask from the bank, can only be asked under the license of a law; and whatever accommodation shall be obtained must be obtained from the voluntary assent of the directors, acting under the responsibility of their trust.

Nor can it be doubted that the department of the Government, which is invested with the power of appointment to all the important offices of the State, is a proper department to exercise the power of appointment in relation to a national trust of incalculable magnitude. The National Bank ought not to be regarded simply as a commercial bank. It will not operate upon the funds of the stockholders alone, but much more upon the funds of the nation. Its conduct, good or bad, will not affect the corporate credit and resources alone, but much more the credit and resources of the Government. In fine, it is not an institution created for the purposes of commerce and profit alone, but much more for the purposes of national policy, as an auxiliary in the exercise of some of the highest powers of the Government. Under such circumstances the public interests cannot be too cautiously guarded, and the guards proposed can never be injurious to the commercial interests of the institution. The right to inspect the general accounts of the bank may be employed to detect the evils of a mal-administration; but an interior agency in the direction of its affairs will best serve to prevent them.

III. It is proposed that, in addition to the usual privileges of a corporation, the notes of the National Bank shall be received in all payments to the United States, unless Congress shall hereafter otherwise provide by law; and that, in addition to the duties usually required from a corporation of this description, the National Bank shall be employed to receive, transfer, and distribute, the public revenue, under the directions of the proper department.

The reservation of a legislative power on the subject of accepting the notes of the National Bank in payments to the Government, is the only new stipulation in the present proposition. It is designed not merely as one of the securities for the general conduct of the bank, but as the means of preserving entire the sovereign authority of Congress relative to the coin and currency of the United States. Recent occurrences inculcate the expediency of such a reservation, but it may be confidently hoped that an occasion to enforce it will never arise.

It is not proposed to stipulate that the bank shall in any case be bound to make loans to the Government; but, in that respect, whenever a loan is authorized by law, the Government will act upon the ordinary footing of an applicant for pecuniary accommodation.

IV. It is proposed that the organization of the National Bank shall be effected with as little delay as possible; and that its operations shall commence and continue upon the basis of payments in the current coin of the United States, with a qualified power under the authority of the Government to suspend such payments.

The proposition now submitted necessarily implies an opinion that it is practicable to commence the operations of the National Bank upon a circulation of gold and silver coin; and, in support of the opinion, a few remarks are respectfully offered to the consideration of the committee:

1. The actual receipts of the bank, at the opening of the subscription, will amount to the sum of $8,400,000; of which the sum of $1,400,000 will consist of gold and silver, and the sum of $7,000,000 will consist of public stock convertible by sale into gold and silver. But the actual receipts of the bank, at the expiration of six months from the opening of the subscription, will amount to the sum of $16,800,000; of which the sum of $2,800,000 will be in gold and silver, and the sum of $14,000,000 will be in public stock convertible by sale into gold and silver. To the fund thus possessed by the bank, the accumulations of the public revenue and the deposits of individuals being added, there can be little doubt, from past experience and observation in reference to similar establishments, that a sufficient foundation will exist for a gradual and judicious issue of bank notes payable on demand in the current coin; unless, contrary to all probability, public confidence should be withheld from the institution, or sinister combinations should be formed to defeat its operations, or the demands of an unfavorable balance of trade should press upon its metallic resources.

2. The public confidence cannot be withheld from the institution. The resources of the nation will be intimately connected with the resources of the bank. The notes of the bank are accredited in every payment to the Government, and must become familiar in every pecuniary negotiation. Unless, therefore, a state of things exist in which gold and silver only can command the public confidence, the National Bank must command it. But the expression of the public sentiment does not, even at this period, leave the question exposed to difficulty and doubt; it is well known that the wealth of opulent and commercial nations requires for its circulation something more than a medium composed of the precious metals. The incompetency of the existing paper substitutes to furnish a national currency is also well known. Hence, throughout the United States, the public hope seems to rest, at this crisis, upon the establishment of a National Bank; and every citizen, upon private or upon patriotic motives, will be prepared to support the institution.

3. Sinister combinations to defeat the operations of a National Bank, ought not to be presumed, and need not be feared. It is true that the influence of the State banks is extensively diffused; but the State banks, and the patrons of the State banks, partake of the existing evils; they must be conscious of the inadequacy of State institutions to restore and maintain the national currency; they will perceive that there is sufficient space in the commercial sphere for the movement of the State banks and the National Bank; and, upon the whole, they will be ready to act upon the impulse of a common duty, and a common interest. If, however, most unexpectedly, a different course should be pursued, the concurring powers of the National Treasury and the National Bank will be sufficient to avert the danger.

4. The demand of an unfavorable balance of trade appears to be much overrated. It is not practicable, at this time, to ascertain either the value of the goods imported since the peace, or the value of the property employed to pay for them. But when it is considered that a great proportion of the importations arose from investments of American funds previously in Europe; that a great proportion of the price has been paid by American exports; that a great proportion has been paid by remittances in American stocks; and that a great proportion remains upon credit to be paid by gradual remittances of goods, as well as in coin; it cannot be justly concluded, that the balance of trade has hitherto materially affected the national stock of the precious metals. So far as an opportunity has occurred for observation, the demand for gold and silver to export appears rather to have arisen from the expectation of obtaining a higher price in a part of Europe, and from the revival of commerce with the countries beyond the Cape of Good Hope, than from any necessity to provide for the payment of the recent importations of goods into the United States. The former of these causes will probably soon cease to operate, and the operation of the latter may, if necessary, be restrained by law.

The proposition now under consideration further provides for a suspension of the bank payments in coin upon any future emergency. This is merely a matter of precaution; but, if the emergency should arise, it must be agreed on all hands that the power of suspension ought rather to be confided to the Government than to the directors of the institution.

V. It is proposed that a bonus be paid to the Government by the subscribers to the National Bank, in consideration of the emoluments to be derived from an exclusive charter, during a period of twenty years.

Independent of the bonus here proposed to be exacted, there are undoubtedly many public advantages to be drawn from the establishment of the National Bank; but these are generally of an incidental kind, and (as in the case of the deposits and distribution of the revenue) may be regarded in the light of equivalents, not for the monopoly of the charter, but for the reciprocal advantages of a fiscal connexion with the public Treasury.

The amount of the bonus should be in proportion to the value of the charter grant; or, in other words, to the net profits which the subscribers will probably make, in consequence of their incorporation. The average rate of the dividends of the State banks, before the suspension of payments in coin, was about eight per cent. per annum. It appears by a report from this department to the House of Representatives, dated the 3d of April, 1810, that the annual dividends of the late Bank of the United States, averaged, throughout the duration of its charter, the rate of 8 13-36 per cent. But under all the circumstances which will attend the establishment and operations of the proposed National Bank, its enlarged capital, and the extended field of competition, it is not deemed reasonable, for the present purpose, to rate the annual dividends of the institution higher than seven per cent. upon its capital of $35,000,000.

Allowing, therefore, two, three, and four years for the payment of the bonus, a sum of $1,500,000 would amount to about four per cent. upon the capital of the bank, and would constitute a just equivalent for the benefits of its charter.

VI. It is proposed that the measures, suggested by the following considerations, be adopted to aid the National Bank in commencing and maintaining its operations upon the basis of payments in the current coin.

1. To restore the national currency of gold and silver it is essential that the quantity of bank paper in circulation should be reduced; but this effort alone will be sufficient to effect the object. By reducing the amount of bank paper its value must be proportionably increased; and as soon as the amount shall be contracted to the limits of a just proportion in the circulating medium of the country, the consequent revival of the uses for coin, in the business of exchange, will insure its reappearance in abundance. The policy, the interest, and the honor of the State banks will stimulate them to undertake and prosecute this salutary work. But it will be proper to apprise them that, after a specified day, the notes of such banks as have not resumed their payments in the current coin will not be received in payments, either to the Government or the National Bank.

2. The resumption of payments in current coin at the State banks will remove every obstacle to the commencement of similar payments at the National Bank. The difficulty of commencing payments in coin is not, however, to be considered as equal to the difficulty of resuming them. The National Bank, free from all engagements, will be able to regulate its issues of paper with a view to the danger, as well as to the demand that may be found to exist. But in addition to the privileges granted by the charter, it will also be proper to apprise the State banks, that, after the commencement of the operations of the National Bank, the notes of such banks as do not agree to receive, reissue, and circulate the notes of that institution, shall not be received in payments either to the Government or to the National Bank.

3. The possibility that the national currency of coin may not be perfectly restored at the time of organizing the bank, has induced the proposition that the payment of the Government subscription to the capital shall be made in Treasury notes, which will be receivable in all payments to the Government, and to the National Bank, but which will not be demandable in coin. The principle of this proposition might, perhaps, be usefully extended to authorize the National Bank to issue notes of a similar character, for a limited period; and it will be proper further to apprise the State banks that the notes of such banks as do not agree to receive, reissue, and circulate these Treasury notes, or National Bank notes, shall not be received in payments, either to the Government or to the National Bank.

I have the honor, very respectfully, sir, to be your most obedient servant,
A. J. DALLAS.

In Treasury notes not fundable nor bearing interest, nor payable at a particular time, but receivable in all payments to the Government, and also in all payments to the bank, with a right, on the part of the bank, to reissue the Treasury notes so paid, from time to time, until they are discharged by payments to the Government.

8. The bank shall be at liberty to sell the stock portion of its capital to an amount not exceeding — in any one year; but, if the sales are intended to be effected in the United States, notice thereof shall be given to the Secretary of the Treasury that the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund may, if they please, become the purchasers, at the market price, not exceeding par.

III. The Government of the Bank.

1. The bank shall be established at Philadelphia, with power to erect branches, or to employ State banks as branches elsewhere.

2. There shall be twenty-five directors for the bank at Philadelphia, and thirteen directors for each of the branches where branches are erected, with the usual description and number of officers.

3. The President of the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall annually appoint five of the directors of the bank at Philadelphia.

4. The qualified stockholders shall annually elect twenty of the directors of the bank at Philadelphia; but a portion of the directors shall be changed at every annual election, upon the principle of rotation.

5. The directors of the bank at Philadelphia shall annually, at their first meeting after their election, choose one of the five directors appointed by the President and Senate of the United States, to be president of the bank; and the president of the bank shall always be re-eligible if reappointed.

6. The directors of the bank at Philadelphia shall annually appoint thirteen directors for each of the branches, where branches are erected, and shall transmit a list of the persons appointed to the Secretary of the Treasury.

7. The Secretary of the Treasury, with the approbation of the President of the United States, shall annually designate, from the list of the branch directors, the person to be the president of the respective branches.

8. None but resident citizens of the United States shall be directors of the bank, or its branches.

9. The stockholders may vote for directors in person or by proxy; but no stockholder, who is not resident within the United States at the time of election, shall vote by proxy; nor shall any one person vote as proxy a greater number of votes than he would be entitled to in his own right, according to a scale of voting to be graduated by the number of shares which the voters respectively hold.

10. The bank and its several branches, or the State banks employed as branches, shall furnish the officer at the head of the Treasury Department with statements of their officers, in such form and at such period as shall be required.

IV. The privileges and duties of the Bank.

1. The bank shall enjoy the usual privileges, and be subject to the usual restrictions of a body corporate and politic, instituted for such purposes, and the forgery of its notes shall be made penal.

2. The notes of the bank shall be receivable in all payments to the United States, unless Congress shall hereafter otherwise provide by law.

3. The bank and its branches, and State banks employed as branches, shall give the necessary aid and facility to the Treasury for transferring the public funds from place to place, and for making payments to the public creditors, without charging commissions, or claiming allowances on account of differences of exchange, &c.

V. The organization and operation of the Bank.

1. Subscriptions to be opened with as little delay as possible, and at as few places as shall be deemed just and convenient. The commissioners may be named in the act, or be appointed by the President.

2. The bank to be organized, and commence its operations in specie, as soon as the sum of $1,400,000 has been actually received from the subscriptions in gold and silver.

3. The bank shall not at any time suspend its specie payments, unless the same shall be previously authorized by Congress, if in session, or by the President of the United States if Congress be not in session. In the latter case, the suspension shall continue for six weeks after the meeting of Congress, unless authorized by law.

VI. The bonus for the charter of the Bank.

The subscribers to the bank shall pay a premium to the Government for its charter. Estimating the profits of the bank from the probable advance in the value of its stock, and the result of its business when in full operation at seven per cent., a bonus of $1,500,000, payable in equal instalments of two, three, and four years, after the bank commences its operations, might, under all circumstances, be considered as about four per cent. upon its capital, and would constitute a reasonable premium.

EXTENSION OF A PATENT RIGHT.

Mr. MARSH, from a select committee, made a report on the petition of John Tyler and Benjamin Tyler which was read: When Mr. MARSH, reported a bill to extend to Benjamin Tyler and John Tyler, of the State of New Hampshire, the patent right to certain improvements in the construction of corn and other mills; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Friday next.—The report is as follows:

That the petitioners represent that, prior to the year 1800, one Benjamin Tyler had invented a new and useful improvement in the construction of flour and other mills; that on that day he obtained a patent, according to law, for the exclusive right of using the said improvement for the term of fourteen years from that date; that afterwards he made an assignment of the said patent to the petitioners in due form. They further represent that several persons interfered with and invaded the right of using the said improvement thus secured to them by the said patent and assignment, by introducing the same into mills without their license; that, in the year 1804, they instituted a suit against one of the persons thus intrenching on their exclusive right to the said improvement; that the defendant in the said suit, by means of combinations of various interested individuals, protracted the pendency of said suit until the year 1810; that the court then arrested the verdict found in the said cause for the plaintiffs, on account of some supposed defect in the declaration; that the petitioners, in the prosecution of the said suit, were put to great expense and trouble, and though by the said verdict they established their right to the exclusive use of the said improvement, yet they lost the benefit of the damages and cost awarded to them by the said verdict; and that, by means of the pendency of the said suit during the space of six years, their said improvement was brought into discredit, and they deprived of the benefit and profit of selling the right to others of using the said improvement, while the time for which the same had been patented to them had in some measure expired.

They pray Congress to pass an act granting to them the exclusive right of using, and vending to others to be used, the said improvement for another term of fourteen years after the expiration of their said patent.

The committee report that they find the facts stated in the said petition supported by sufficient testimony, and that the said invention is a new and useful improvement in the construction of mills, and that the prayer of the petitioner ought to be granted. They recommend to Congress the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioners ought to be granted; and that the exclusive right of using the said improvement be extended to the said petitioners for the term of seven years from this time.

REVENUE SYSTEM REVISED.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom have been referred that part of the President's Message which relates to the revenue, and the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, except that part which relates to the establishment of a National Bank, made a report; which was read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole on Friday next.—The report is as follows:

The Committee of Ways and Means, to whom have been committed that part of the President's Message which relates to the revenue, and the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, excepting that part which relates to the establishment of a bank, ask leave to explain the general views which have induced them to submit to the House the propositions with which they shall conclude their report:

"The arrangement of the finances, with a view to the receipts and expenditures of a permanent Peace Establishment," has been the first subject, after providing for the deficiency in the appropriations of 1815, which has engaged the attention of the committee. Whilst they recognise, with unmixed satisfaction, "that improvement in the condition of the public revenue, which will allow an immediate alleviation of the burdens imposed by the necessities of the war," they well know that such an alleviation can only be expected and wished to an extent "which shall leave to the Government the means of maintaining its faith inviolate, and of prosecuting successfully the measures of a liberal" and provident policy.

In forming an opinion upon the expenditures of a permanent Peace Establishment, they have supposed it right that their attention should be directed, not only to the resources of the United States, but to the condition of other Powers. In the perplexed system of European policy the United States can have no disposition to interpose; but their conduct must necessarily be affected by views connected with the military or financial resources of those States with which their relations are most interesting. It is impossible not to see that Europe is more military than ever, and that, accustomed by twenty years of war to exertions that were once thought impracticable, her Governments have acquired a power which makes preparation more difficult and more necessary on the part of every State exposed to the chance of their hostility. It must be doubtful what precise increase of expenditure these considerations of foreign policy or views of internal improvement may induce Congress eventually to authorize; but even the measures now before them appear to require a considerable addition to the estimates of the annual peace expenditure.

The only preparation against the dangers of foreign aggression, which it falls within the duties of the Committee of Ways and Means to recommend, is that of a revenue; which, in supplying the wants of the Government, shall not burden unnecessarily the industry of the citizen; which shall be capable of repairing, by an expansion of the powers of some of its parts, the injuries which war may inflict in others; and, above all, shall be disencumbered from debt as soon as the resources of the country and the conditions of its contracts will permit. Public debts have, indeed, sometimes been considered as giving stability and order to a State, but the committee can never believe that a Government which secures every civil and political right to the great body of the people, can want that security which would be afforded by the distribution of any amount of annual interest upon its debt, which, to be received by the few, must be paid by the many. It may be true that a public debt only makes a different distribution of the income of society, but it pays the stockholder what would be reserved for supporting the seaman and the soldier. That Government, indeed, does well, which, when forced into war, brings into the contest every resource which credit or revenue can furnish; but it neglects one of its first duties when it allows the season of peace to pass away without an adequate provision for removing every encumbrance upon its effective revenue. The committee accordingly consider it as an indispensable requisite in any arrangement of revenue and expenditure in peace, that it shall provide for the rapid extinguishment of the public debt.

To attain this object a considerable revenue will be required. In selecting the taxes which should compose it, the duties upon imported articles may be expected to furnish the principal supply. Cheap and easy in their collection, paid like all indirect taxes, when it is convenient to pay them, they will be found, under a system of prudent moderation, to discourage no branch of national industry. Duties, indeed, either upon importation or exportation, seem to be the natural resource of countries thinly peopled, which, exporting a large amount of their agricultural productions, receive in return the manufactures of older States. The distance, too, of the States from which our importations are made, renders it more difficult to evade the payment of duties here than in countries which are separated from active and enterprising neighbors by a river or a conventional line. But as our agriculture obtains markets at home, as wealth spreads itself over inland countries, where commerce can but imperfectly follow, our imports as well as our exports must bear a continually lessening proportion to the wealth of the country.

And even now, while the principal source of ordinary revenue in peace must be furnished by the customs, it is probable that they could not be continued or increased to an amount which the interest and reimbursement of our debt and the provisions for our security require, without increasing too far the temptation to illicit importation. The objections, too, to an entire reliance upon them, have been too fully developed by recent experience to allow the committee to recommend that they should constitute the whole income of the country. The liberal provision which they are capable of making in peace, disappears in the moment when war requires larger contributions. The Government which is left at such a time to explore new systems of internal taxation, to discover and draw into the public service the men who are capable of filling the different departments of the revenue, is reduced to a condition in which the zeal, and bravery, and resources of the nation can produce their natural effects but imperfectly. The committee, therefore, concur fully with the Secretary of the Treasury in the opinion which he has expressed, "that the establishment of a revenue system, which shall not be exclusively dependent upon the supplies of foreign commerce, appears, at this juncture, to claim particular attention."

As a result of these general views the committee, with deference to the House, recommend the adoption of the plan of revenue contained in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, with the exception of that part of it which proposes to continue the additional duties upon postage, and to repeal the additional duties on licenses to retailers of wines, spirituous liquors, and foreign merchandise, imposed by the act of December, 1814. The communication of intelligence between the different parts of the country, it appears to the committee to be the just policy of our Government to facilitate and encourage; and, although it might have been right to exact a revenue from it, under circumstances which made it necessary to apply every resource to the defence of the State, the present situation of the Treasury may well allow of its repeal. The duties on licenses to retailers admit, in the opinion of the committee, of a modification, which, by proportioning the price of the license in some degree to the business of the retailer, shall render them as productive as the new rates, and less oppressive than the old ones. But as such modification could only apply to licenses for 1817, the committee propose to make it the subject of a future report.

The permanent laws now in force may be expected, after the expiration of temporary duties, to produce a net annual revenue of $25,278,840.

Such is the estimate of the annual revenue which, by law, is declared to be pledged "to provide for the payment of the expenses of the Government, for the punctual payment of the public debt, and for creating an adequate sinking fund." The annual naval expense at	-	2,716,510
The interest in the funded debt, at about	-	6,150,000

To this estimate of annual expenditure might be added the amount of about $1,850,000, appropriated to the payment of the principal of the public debt; which, with the $6,150,000 applicable to the payment of the interest, constitutes the sinking fund of $8,000,000. But perhaps an easier view of the subject may be afforded by stating separately the whole sum which it is proposed to apply to the payment of the principal of the public debt, exclusively of the interest.

If the annual revenue, under the law proposed, be $25,369,500, and the ordinary annual expense be $15,778,669, there will be a balance of $9,590,831, which may be applied, as Congress shall direct, to national defence, to internal improvement, and to the extinguishment of the public debt. The considerations which have been already adverted to as enjoining the policy of providing for the extinguishment of the public debt as soon as the resources of the country and the condition of its contracts will permit, induce the committee to propose that to that object may be annually appropriated seven millions, after the year 1816; which, added to the sum appropriated to the payment of interest, will form a sinking fund of $13,150,000, and extinguish the public debt in less than twelve years. This appropriation would still leave an excess of annual revenue above the estimates of ordinary expenditure furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury of upwards of two millions and a half, to be applied to any other branch of the public service.

The committee have confined their observations to the receipts and expenditures of a permanent Peace Establishment. The modification of the plan of the Secretary of the Treasury which they have proposed, will produce too small an effect upon the receipts of 1816 to require a distinct exposition of them, and the deficiency in the receipts of 1816, (which is suggested in the Treasury report,) cannot disturb the calculations which have been submitted of the receipts and expenditures of succeeding years, since the estimated deficiency is less than seven millions, and the outstanding revenue on the 1st of January 1817, will be about twenty millions. If, however, the demands upon the Treasury in 1817, in consequence of Congress assuming the payment of expenses incurred during the war, which it has not yet sanctioned, or from any other cause, shall be increased beyond the present estimates, or beyond an amount for which the unappropriated revenue may provide, the sinking fund may be charged for the year 1817 with the payment of the Treasury notes which may be issued under the laws now in force. In preventing an addition of new funded debt, it will perform its office as usefully as in extinguishing the old debt.

"An act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government and maintaining the public credit, by duties on sales at auction, and on licenses to retail wines, spirituous liquors, and foreign merchandise, and for increasing the rates of postage," passed on the 23d of December, 1814, as imposes additional duties on postage.

6. Resolved, That it is expedient so to amend the act, entitled "An act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying a direct tax upon the United States, and to provide for assessing and collecting the same," passed on the 9th January, 1815, as to reduce the direct tax to be levied, for the year 1816, and succeeding years, to three millions; and also so to amend the act, entitled "An act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government and maintaining the public credit, by laying a direct tax upon the District of Columbia," passed on the 27th of February, 1815, as to reduce the direct tax to be levied therein, annually, to $9,999 20.

7. Resolved, That it is expedient to repeal the act, entitled "An act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government and maintaining the public credit, by laying duties on spirits distilled within the United States and Territories thereof, and by amending the act laying duties on licenses to distillers of spirituous liquors," passed on the 21st of December, 1814, excepting only the 16th, 18th, 19th, and 24th sections thereof, from and after the 1st of April next, and from the same day to add one hundred per cent. to the amount of the duty which all stills now subject to duty are liable to pay.

8. Resolved, That it is expedient to repeal, from and after the 18th day of April next, the act, entitled "An act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government and maintaining the public credit, by laying duties on various goods, wares, and merchandise, manufactured within the United States," passed on the 18th of January, 1815; and also the act, entitled "An act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government and maintaining the public credit, by laying a duty on gold, silver, and plated ware, and jewelry, and paste work, manufactured within the United States," passed on the 27th of February, 1815, from the same day.

9. Resolved, That it is expedient to repeal the act, entitled "An act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government and maintaining the public credit, by laying duties on household furniture, and on gold and silver watches," passed on the 18th of January, 1815.

10. Resolved, That it is expedient so to amend the rates of duties upon imported articles, after the 30th of June next, as that they shall be estimated to produce an amount equal to that which would be produced by an average addition of forty-two per cent. to the permanent rates of duties.

11. Resolved, That the deficiency arising from the reduction or abolition of any of the duties heretofore pledged by law for the support of the Government, for the payment of the public debt, and the establishment of a sinking fund, shall be supplied by appropriating to those objects a sufficient amount from the product of the taxes or duties proposed to be continued or increased.

12. Resolved, That it is expedient that, from and after the year 1816, an addition shall be made to the sum of $8,000,000, now annually appropriated for the payment of the interest and principal of the public debt, so as to make the whole sum to be appropriated annually to that purpose, $13,500,000.

Ordered, That the Committee of Ways and Means be discharged from a further consideration of the several petitions referred to them, which relate to the subjects embraced in the last mentioned report.

COMMERCE WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

The House, according to the order of the day, resumed the consideration of the bill for carrying into effect the Convention of Commerce between the United States and Great Britain—the question being on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. GHOLSON said, that being a member of the committee who had reported the bill then before the House, he had considered it especially his duty to give to it the most thorough investigation. He regretted that, owing to his personal indisposition, it had been out of his power to bestow on the subject that attention, which its importance most undoubtedly merited. He, however, had listened patiently to the arguments which had been offered by gentlemen on the other side of the House, in opposition to the bill. These arguments had produced no conviction to his mind. So far from it, (said Mr. G.) I am fully satisfied, that if the doctrines which have been contended for by gentlemen of distinction and eminent abilities, in the opposition, were reduced to practice, then indeed would the great and essential powers of the Government be transferred exclusively to the President and Senate, and this House would become almost a cypher—but little more than a mere tribunal of registry.

Two of the chief and principal objects of the federal compact were, the provision of an adequate national revenue, and the regulation of commerce with foreign nations. Jurisdiction over both these subjects is given by the Constitution, in clear and explicit terms, to the Congress of the United States. The Constitution expressly grants to Congress the power "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises;" and, moreover, "to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes."

But if the affairs of revenue from imposts, and of commerce, can be finally and conclusively arranged by the treaty-making authority, without the aid of legislation, it is perfectly obvious, that the grants of power just recited can be nullified and extinguished at the mere pleasure of the President and Senate, who alone exercise the treaty-making authority; that powers which are bestowed on them and on this House conjointly, can be exercised by them exclusively.

Now, sir, to prove that the treaty, to effectuate which the present bill is proposed, does, in fact, take cognizance both of the subject of taxation and of commerce, it is only necessary to look at the treaty itself. The treaty, in almost its whole aim and purport, relates to these subjects. It not only regulates our commerce with a foreign nation, but expressly undertakes to repeal a tax. By the existing law, British ships pay higher duties in our ports than American ships. The treaty provides, that in certain cases, embracing the principal trade between the two countries, British ships shall pay no higher duties than American. Thus the law of the land, providing for a public revenue, is so far attempted to be revoked by the treaty in question.

If, then, the self sufficiency of this treaty, for its own execution, without the agency of legislative provisions, can, according to the argument of the gentlemen from Pennsylvania and Massachusetts, (Messrs. HOPKINSON and PICKERING,) be maintained, it must be upon the ground, that the treaty-making power can either repeal a tax or regulate foreign commerce, independently of this House. Let us examine the subject in this aspect of it.

If it be admitted, that the treaty-making power can repeal a tax, it will, I apprehend, scarcely be denied, that the same power can, in like manner, impose a tax. Suppose, then, the President and Senate were, by convention with Great Britain, to stipulate for one hundred per cent. increase of duties on all merchandises imported into the United States from all foreign places, except from the British possessions, alleging that this exemption, in favor of Great Britain, was in consideration of the India trade, for which, it is said, no equivalent has been given by us. This would be an enormous tax on the people; and a tax, too, levied without the consent of their representatives. But, sir, where did the idea originate of the imposition of a tax in a free country, without the concurrence of the immediate representatives of the people? The idea is preposterous, and one against which I enter my solemn protestation! I deny that there is any power on earth that can tax my constituents one cent, without their approbation, freely given, through their representative on this floor.

But still it is insisted that although the treaty contains provisions repealing the discriminating duties on British vessels and on goods imported in them, it is nevertheless a valid instrument. Suppose, sir, this repealing power had been exercised on another subject. Suppose the President and Senate had undertaken by treaty stipulation wholly to repeal the tax on foreign spirits. The amount of the tax repealed cannot vary the principle—if they can repeal a tax for one dollar, they can repeal one imposing millions. Yet I apprehend that the repeal by the treaty-making power, of the tax last mentioned, would be considered so outrageous an usurpation of the legislative authority, that it would not be submitted to for one moment.

Further, sir, according to the same reasoning, even the direct tax might be reduced or repealed by the treaty-making power. If by that tax agriculture were supposed to be oppressed, the doctrine contended for, would enable the President and Senate (the United States receiving an equivalent) to remove the tax in order to encourage the production of such articles as Great Britain might want from this country, and to supply her with them in greater abundance, and on better terms. The articles, for instance, of cotton, tobacco, and flour.

These cases all demonstrate the absurdity of claiming for the treaty-making power, in this country, any control whatever over the public revenue. The truth is, that except as a part of the Legislature, it possesses none; and from the very structure of our Government, cannot possess any.

The claim, sir, of the same power to regulate, at its pleasure, our foreign commerce, without the interference of this House, will be found to rest on no better grounds.

If with a view to a better understanding, and a closer connexion with Great Britain, the President and Senate were to agree by convention with that nation, to prohibit the exportation of cotton and woollen manufactures from the United States, for the next thirty years; or were to stipulate that the United States should not clear any vessel direct from other ports to France, Spain, Holland, or any other European country, except to Great Britain, such convention would, on the face of it, appear to be a complete and perfect act, and requiring, therefore, agreeably to the arguments of the gentlemen on the other side, no legislative sanction; all that would be necessary would be instructions from the Secretary of the Treasury to the collectors of the customs. If, as it has been contended, the treaty-making authority possesses absolute control over our foreign commerce, there can exist no doubt of its competency to enter into these engagements. Yet the very attempt to control them would be considered monstrous, and would no doubt be universally resisted. The doctrine, sir, proves too much, and therefore proves nothing.

Again: suppose the treaty-making power were, as was once contemplated by the British Government, to engage that during any European war in which Great Britain might be a party, all American vessels bound to the ports of any nation in hostility with Great Britain, should first call or touch at some British port, and there pay a tax, and take a license for the benefit of prosecuting their voyages! Let me ask if such an engagement would not be considered as a most daring usurpation? Yes, sir, it would be viewed as an alarming encroachment upon the rights of this House, and of the nation, and would be repelled with indignation? And still this and all the cases of treaty stipulation which I have supposed would come fully within the rule laid down by gentlemen on the other side of the question, as the limit of the treaty-making power, namely, that whenever a treaty can, according to its own terms, execute itself, it requires no legislative sanction. I trust I have already sufficiently shown the fallacy of this position.

But some gentlemen have recurred to another ground of argument. They say that treaties are themselves the supreme law of the land, and can, therefore, require no legislation to give to them additional validity. This idea was strenuously enforced by a gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. MILLS.)

In considering the remarks of gentlemen on this branch of the subject, it will be perceived how necessary it is that positions in debate should be laid down with accuracy and precision. Gentlemen may be astonished, perhaps, when I announce to them my dissent from the position which they have so triumphantly advanced, in relation to the supremacy of treaties. Now, I deny, sir, the correctness of the proposition that treaties are the supreme law of the land. I very readily admit that treaties, made under the authority of the United States, that is, Constitutional treaties, are the supreme law of the land. But the broad, unqualified assertion, that treaties generally, (whether violative of the Constitution or not,) partake of that high and sacred character, is manifestly untenable. Here, then, the very gist of the question is, whether the Constitution does in fact confer the right to make such a treaty as the one before us, without the sanction of this House?

Having endeavored to show that such right has not been conferred, I will decline repeating the arguments which I have already had the honor of addressing to the House; especially after the luminous exposition of the subject with which we have been favored by the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. LOWNDES.) Nor will I detain you respecting the definitions that have been given with regard to the extent of the treaty-making power. As to that, I will observe, that, subject to the limitations of the Constitution, I should conceive the treaty-making authority in this country as large and as comprehensive as the same authority in any other civilized State. After conceding to this House the privileges for which it contends, and which are evidently guaranteed to it by the Constitution, there would still be left to the treaty-making authority a wide range of powers. For instance, the entire subject of belligerent regulations, including the most important topic of impressment; the question of search, the subject of boundaries, and many others which it would be useless perhaps to enumerate.

I cannot perceive, sir, the advantage of resorting, as gentlemen have done, to the British Government for precedents on this occasion. The analogies between that Government and ours, are in general too weak to authorize the deduction therefrom of any principle that can be safely depended on. It is understood, however, that the practice even of the British Government has always been in accordance with the principles which are maintained by the advocates of this bill.

It results, therefore, from every view of the subject, of which I conceive it is fairly susceptible, that the bill now before us is not only not an useless one, as it has been said to be, but that it is absolutely indispensable; indispensable, in order to the fulfilment of the stipulations of the treaty, and because it relates to powers which cannot be exercised without the concurrence of this House.

Mr. CALHOUN observed, that the votes on this bill had been ordered to be recorded; and that the House would see, in his peculiar situation, a sufficient apology for his offering his reasons for the rejection of the bill. He had no disposition to speak on this bill, as he felt contented to let it take that course which, in the opinion of the majority, it ought, until the members were called on by the order of the House to record their votes.

The question presented for consideration is perfectly simple, and easily understood—Is this bill necessary to give validity to the late treaty with Great Britain? It appeared to him that this question is susceptible of a decision, without considering whether a treaty can in any case set aside a law; or, to be more particular, whether the treaty which this bill purposes to carry into effect does repeal the discriminating duties. The House will remember that a law was passed at the close of the last session conditionally repealing those duties. That act proposed to repeal them in relation to any nation which would on its part agree to repeal similar duties as to this country. On the contingency happening the law became positive. It has happened, and has been announced to the country that England has agreed to repeal. The President, in proclaiming the treaty, has notified the fact to the House and country. Why then propose to do that by this bill which has already been done by a previous act? He knew it had been said in conversation that the provisions of the act were not as broad as the treaty. It did not strike him so. They appeared to him to be commensurate. He would also reason from the appearance of this House that they were not very deeply impressed with the necessity of this bill. He never, on any important occasion, saw it so indifferent. Whence could this arise? From the want of importance? If, indeed, the existence of the treaty depended on the passage of this bill, nothing scarcely could be more interesting. It would be calculated to excite strong feelings. We all know how the country was agitated when Jay's Treaty was before this House. The question was on an appropriation to carry it into effect—a power acknowledged by all to belong to the House—and on the exercise of which the existence of the treaty was felt to depend. The feelings manifested corresponded with this conviction. Not so on this occasion. Further: the treaty has already assumed the form of law. It is so proclaimed to the community; the words of the proclamation are not material; it speaks for itself; and if it means anything, it announces the treaty as a rule of public conduct, as a law exacting the obedience of the people. Were he of the opposite side, if he indeed believed this treaty to be a dead letter until it had received the sanction of Congress, he would lay the bill on the table and move an inquiry into the fact why the treaty has been proclaimed as a law before it had received the proper sanction. It is true, the Executive has transmitted a copy of the treaty to the House; but has he sent the negotiation?

Has he given any light to judge why it should receive the sanction of this body? Do gentlemen mean to say that information is not needed; that though we have the right to pass laws to give validity to treaties, yet we are bound by a moral obligation to pass such laws? To talk of the right of this House to sanction treaties, and at the same time to assert that it is under a moral obligation not to withhold that sanction, is a solecism. No sound mind that understands the terms can possibly assent to it. He would caution the House, while it was extending its powers to cases which he believed did not belong to it, to take care lest it should lose its substantial and undoubted power. He would put it on its guard against the dangerous doctrine that it can in any case become a mere registering body. Another fact in regard to this treaty. It does not stipulate that a law should pass to repeal the duties proposed to be repealed by this bill, which would be its proper form, if in the opinion of the negotiators a law was necessary; but it stipulates in positive terms for their repeal without consulting or regarding us.

Mr. C. here concluded this part of the discussion, by stating that it appeared to him, from the whole complexion of the case, that the bill before the House was mere form, and not supposed to be necessary to the validity of the treaty. It would be proper however, he observed, to reply to the arguments which have been urged on the general nature of the treaty-making power, and, as it was a subject of great importance, he solicited the attentive hearing of the House. It is not denied, he believed, that the President with the concurrence of two thirds of the Senate have a right to make commercial treaties; it is not asserted that this treaty is couched in such general terms as to require a law to carry the details into execution. Why then is this bill necessary? Because, say gentlemen, that the treaty of itself, without the aid of this bill, cannot exempt British tonnage and goods imported in their bottoms, from the operation of the law laying additional duties on foreign tonnage and goods imported in foreign vessels; or, giving the question a more general form, because a treaty cannot annul a law. The gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. BARBOUR,) who argued this point very distinctly, though not satisfactorily, took as his general position, that to repeal a law is a legislative act, and can only be done by law; that, in the distribution of the legislative treaty-making power, the right to repeal a law fell exclusively under the former. How does this comport with the admission immediately made by him, that the Treaty of Peace repealed the act declaring war? If he admits the fact in a single case, what becomes of his exclusive legislative right? He indeed felt that his rule failed him, and in explanation assumed a position entirely new; for he admitted that when the treaty did that which was not authorized to be done by law, it did not require the sanction of Congress, and might in its operation repeal a law inconsistent with it. He said, Congress is not authorized to make peace; and for this reason a Treaty of Peace repeals the act declaring war. In this position, he understood his colleague substantially to concur. He hoped to make it appear that, in taking this ground, they have both yielded the point in discussion. He would establish, he trusted, to the satisfaction of the House, that the treaty-making power, when it was legitimately exercised, always did that which could not be done by law; and that the reasons advanced to prove that the Treaty of Peace repealed the act making war, so far from being peculiar to that case, apply to all treaties. They do not form an exception, but in fact constitute the rule. Why then, he asked, cannot Congress make peace? They have the power to declare war. All acknowledge this power. Peace and war are the opposites. They are the positive and negative terms of the same proposition; and what rule of construction more clear, than that when a power is given to do an act, the power is also given to repeal it? By what right do you repeal taxes, reduce your Army, lay up your Navy, or repeal any law, but by the force of this plain rule of construction? Why cannot Congress then repeal the act declaring war? He acknowledged with the gentleman, they cannot, consistently with reason. The solution of this question explained the whole difficulty. The reason is plain; one Power may make war; it requires two to make peace. It is a state of mutual amity succeeding mutual hostility; it is a state that cannot be created but with the consent of both parties. It required a contract or a treaty between the nations at war. Is this peculiar to a Treaty of Peace? No, it is common to all treaties. It rises out of their nature, and not from any accidental circumstance attaching itself to a particular class. It is no more or less than that Congress cannot make a contract with a foreign nation. Let us apply it to a treaty of commerce—to this very case. Can Congress do what this treaty has done? It has repealed the discriminating duties between this country and England. Either could by law repeal its own. But by law they could go no farther; and for the same reason that peace cannot be made by law. Whenever, then, an ordinary subject of legislation can only be regulated by contract, it passes from the sphere of the ordinary power of making laws, and attaches itself to that of making treaties, wherever it is lodged. All acknowledge the truth of this conclusion, where the subject on which the treaty operates is not expressly given to Congress. But in other cases they consider the two powers as concurrent; and conclude, from the nature of such powers, that such treaties must be confirmed by law. Will they acknowledge the opposite, that laws on such subjects must be confirmed by treaties? And if, as they state, a law can repeal a treaty when concurrent, why not a treaty a law? Into such absurdities do false doctrines lead. The truth is, the legislative and treaty-making power, are never in the strict sense concurrent. They both may have the same subject, as in this case commerce; but they discharge functions as different in relation to it in their nature, as their subject is alike.

Commerce with Great Britain.

H. OF R.

When we speak of concurrent powers, we mean when both can do the same thing; but he contended, that when the two powers under discussion were confined to their proper sphere, not only the law could not do what could be done by treaty, but the reverse was true; that is, they never are nor can be concurrent powers. It is only when we reason on this subject that we mistake; in all other cases the common sense of the House and country decide correctly. It is proposed to establish some regulation of commerce; we immediately inquire, does it depend on our will; can we make the desired regulation without the concurrence of any foreign Power. If so, it belongs to Congress, and any one would feel it to be absurd to attempt to effect it by treaty. On the contrary, does it require the consent of a foreign Power; is it proposed to grant a favor, to repeal discriminating duties on both sides? It is equally felt to belong to the treaty power; and he would be thought insane who would propose to abolish the discriminating duties in any case, by an act of the American Congress. It is calculated, he felt, almost to insult the good sense of the House, to dwell on a point apparently so clear. What then would he infer from what had been advanced? That, according to the argument of gentlemen, treaties, producing a state of things inconsistent with the provisions of an existing law, annul such provisions. But as he did not agree with them in the view which they took, he would here present his own for consideration. Why then has a treaty the force which he attributed to it? Because it is an act in its own nature paramount to laws made by the common legislative powers of the country. It is in fact a law and something more, a law established by contract between independent nations. To analogise it to private life, law has the same relations to treaty, as the resolution taken by an individual to his contract. An individual may make the most deliberate promise—he may swear it in the most solemn form—that he would not sell his house or any other property he may have; yet, if he would afterwards sell, the sale would be valid in law; he would not be admitted in a court of justice to plead his oath against his contract. Take a case of Government in its simple form, where it was purely despotic, that is, all power lodged in the hands of a single individual. Would not his treaties repeal inconsistent edicts?

Let us now ascend from the instances cited, to illustrate the nature of the two powers, to the principle on which the paramount character of a treaty rests. A treaty always affects the interests of two; a law, only that of a single nation. It is an established principle of politics and morality, that the interest of the many is paramount to that of the few. In fact, it is a principle so radical, that without it no system of morality, no rational scheme of Government, could exist. It is for this reason that contracts, or that treaties, which are only the contracts of independent nations, or, to express both in two words, that plighted faith has in all ages and nations been considered so solemn. But it is said, in opposition to this position, that a subsequent law can repeal a treaty; and to this proposition, he understood that the member from North Carolina (Mr. Gaston) assented. Strictly speaking, he denied the fact. He knew that a law might assume the appearance of repealing a treaty; but he insisted it was only in appearance, and that, in point of fact, it was not a repeal. Whenever a law was proposed, declaring a treaty void, he considered that the House acted not as a legislative body, but judicially. He would illustrate his ideas? If the House is a moral body, that is, if it is governed by reason and virtue, which it must always be presumed to be, the only question that ever could occupy its attention whenever a treaty is to be declared void, is whether, under all of the circumstances of the case, the treaty is not already destroyed, by being violated by the nation with whom it is made, or by the existence of some other circumstance, if other there can be. The House determines this question. Is the country any longer bound by the treaty? Has it not ceased to exist? The nation passes in judgment on its own contract; and this, from the necessity of the case, as it admits no superior power to which it can refer for decision. If any other consideration moves the House to repeal a treaty, it can be considered only in the light of a violation of a contract acknowledged to be binding on the country. A nation may, it is true, violate its contract; they may even do this under the form of law; but he was not considering what might be done, but what might be rightfully done. It is not a question of power, but of right. Why are not these positions, in themselves so clear, universally assented to? Gentlemen are alarmed at imaginary consequences. They argue not as if seeking for the meaning of the Constitution, but as if deliberating on the subject of making one; not as members of the Legislature, and acting under a Constitution already established, but as that of a convention about to frame one. For his part, he had always regarded the Constitution as a work of great wisdom, and, being the instrument under which we existed as a body, it was our duty to bow to its enactments, whatever they may be, with submission. We ought scarcely to indulge a wish that its provisions should be different from what they in fact are. The consequences, however, which appear to work with so much terror on the minds of the gentlemen, he considered to be without any just foundation. The treaty-making power has many and powerful limits; and it will be found, when he came to discuss what those limits are, that it cannot destroy the Constitution, our personal liberty, involve us without the assent of this House in war, or grant away our money. The limits he proposed to this power are not the same, it is true, but they appeared to him much more rational and powerful than those which were supposed to present effectual guards to its abuse. Let us now consider what they are? The grant of the power to make treaties is couched in the most general terms. The words of the Constitution are, that the President shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur. In a subsequent part of the Constitution, treaties are declared to be the supreme law of the land. Whatever limits are imposed on those general terms ought to be the result of the sound construction of the instrument. There appeared to him but two restrictions on its exercise; the one derived from the nature of our Government, and the other from that of the power itself. Most certainly all grants of power under the Constitution must be controlled by that instrument; for, having their existence from it, they must of necessity assume that form which the Constitution has imposed. This is acknowledged to be true of the legislative power, and it is doubtless equally so of the power to make treaties. The limits of the former are exactly marked; it was necessary to prevent collision with similar co-existing State powers. This country is divided into many distinct sovereignties. Exact enumeration here is necessary to prevent the most dangerous consequences. The enumeration of legislative powers in the Constitution has relation then, not to the treaty-power, but to the powers of the State. In our relation to the rest of the world the case is reversed. Here the States disappear. Divided within, we present the exterior of undivided sovereignty. The wisdom of the Constitution appears conspicuous. When enumeration was needed, there we find the powers enumerated and exactly defined; when not, we do not find what would be vain and pernicious. Whatever, then, concerns our foreign relations; whatever requires the consent of another nation, belongs to the treaty power; can only be regulated by it; and it is competent to regulate all such subjects; provided, and here are its true limits, such regulations are not inconsistent with the Constitution. If so they are void. No treaty can alter the fabric of our Government, nor can it do that which the Constitution has expressly forbid to be done; nor can it do that differently which is directed to be done in a given mode, and all other modes prohibited. For instance, the Constitution of the United States says, no money "shall be drawn out of the Treasury but by an appropriation made by law." Of course no subsidy can be granted without an act of law, and a treaty of alliance could not involve the country in war without the consent of this House. With this limitation it is easy to explain the case put by my colleague, who said that, according to one limitation, a treaty might have prohibited the introduction of a certain description of persons before the year 1808, notwithstanding the clause in the Constitution to the contrary. Mr. C. said that he would speak plainly on this point; it was the intention of the Constitution that the slave trade should be tolerated till the time mentioned. It covered him with confusion to name it here. He felt ashamed of such a tolerance, and took a large part of the disgrace, as he represented a part of the Union by whose influence it might be supposed to have been introduced. Though Congress alone is prohibited by the words of th clause from inhibiting that odious traffic, yet his colleague would admit that it was intended to be a general prohibition on the Government of the Union. He perceived his colleague indicated his dissent. It will be necessary to be more explicit. Here Mr. C. read that part of the Constitution, and showed that the word "Congress" might be left out, in conformity to other parts of the Constitution, without injury to the sense of the clause; and he insisted that the plain meaning of the parties to the Constitution, was, that the trade should continue till 1808, and that a prohibition by treaty would be equally against the spirit of the instrument. Besides these Constitutional limits, the treaty power, like all powers, has others derived from its object and nature. It has for its object contracts with foreign nations, as the powers of Congress have for their object whatever can be done in relation to the powers delegated to it without the consent of foreign nations. Each in its proper sphere operates with general influence; but when they became erratic, then they were portentous and dangerous. A treaty never can legitimately do that which can be done by law; and the converse is also true. Suppose the discriminating duties repealed on both sides by law, yet what is effected by this treaty would not even then be done; the plighted faith would be wanting. Either side might repeal its law without breach of contract. It appeared to him that gentlemen are too much influenced on the subject by the example of Great Britain. Instead of looking to the nature of our Government, they have been swayed in their opinion by the practice of that Government to which we are but too much in the habit of looking for precedents. Much anxiety has recently been evinced to be independent of English broadcloths and muslins. He hoped it indicated the approach of a period when we should also throw off the thralldom of thought. The truth is, but little analogy exists between this and any other Government. It is the pride of ours to be founded in reason and equity; all others have originated more or less in fraud, violence, or accident. The right to make treaties in England can only be determined by the practice of that Government, as she has no written Constitution. Her practice may be wise in regard to her Government, when it would be very imprudent here. Admitting the fact to be, then, that the King refers all commercial treaties affecting the municipal regulations of the country to Parliament, for its sanction, the ground would be very feeble to prove that to be the intention of our Constitution. Strong difference exists between the forms of the two Governments. The King is hereditary; he alone, without the participation of either House of Parliament, negotiates and makes treaties; they have no Constitution emanating from the people, alike superior to the Legislature and the King. Not so here. The President is elected for a short period; he is amenable to the public opinion; he is liable to be impeached for corruption; he cannot make treaties without the concurrence of two-thirds of the Senate, a fact very material to be remembered, which body is in like manner responsible to the people at periods not very remote; above all, as the laws and Constitution are here perfectly distinct, and the latter is alike superior to laws and treaties, the treaty power cannot change the form of Government, or encroach on the liberties of the country, without encroaching on that instrument, which, so long as the people are free, will be watched with vigilance.

Mr. RANDOLPH said, when he took his seat yesterday, or rather before he was qualified to take his seat, he had considered the bill then and now under discussion as one of perhaps as trivial a nature as ever engaged the attention of this House, or of any legislative body. But, of this bill, it might be said, vires acquirit eundo; and of this perhaps he was about to afford the House some proof, by adding his little rill to swell the torrent of debate to which this bill had given rise. Certainly—and he knew with what suspicions such declarations were generally received, but he spoke it bona fide—he had no intention to utter one word on the subject until he heard doctrines against which he felt himself bound to enter his solemn protest. He might say of this bill, as of some disease, the danger was in the mode of treatment, in the doctor, and not in the disease. He hoped the gentleman from South Carolina would pardon him when he had heard doctrines from him this day, against which he felt it his solemn and bounden duty to enter his protest. There was nothing in this, he knew, to alarm the gentleman, for it was the protest of a feeble isolated individual, but of an individual who would discharge his duty off this floor and on this floor, with the same zeal and perseverance as if he commanded a majority of the House at his beck. If he understood the gentleman, Mr. R. said, he had declared that a treaty, being of the nature of a compact, touching the interests of other nations than our own, it therefore followed, that the treaty-making power, so long as it confined itself to its own sphere, that of contract; so long as it received equivalents for what it gave, whether real or nominal, according to the gentleman's doctrine no matter—they are not to be crippled up, not to be examined; that inasmuch as the interest of two nations instead of one, were concerned in all treaties; therefore the treaty-making power is paramount to the legislative power—did he or did he not understand the gentleman? It was impossible to misunderstand him; for, Mr. R. said, he had stated his positions with a precision and clearness which left no room for doubt—yes, that treaties, being paramount, of course repealed the law of the land, so far as the law of the land came into collision with any article of a treaty which was confined to the legitimate objects of a treaty, viz: to contracts with another nation. But the honorable gentleman from South Carolina had, with peculiar infelicity of illustration, drawn examples from despotic Governments. Would a treaty made by a Sultan of Constantinople or an Emperor of France go to repeal a law of the Turkish or French empire? Certainly it would. For what are the laws of a despotic monarchy but the breath of the sovereign, call him what you will? And was that an analogy on which to found a construction of our Constitution, on which the gentleman had bestowed so high but not undeserved an eulogium? No; it was because a treaty made by a despotic Power will repeal the law of the land there, that a treaty made by Presidential authority will not repeal the law of the land here. To come to the gentleman's experimentem crucis, and try the strength of his argument, that a treaty is paramount to the law of the land. Suppose the Treaty of Peace had contained a provision for ceding away a part or the whole of South Carolina, as an equivalent for Jamaica, for territory in India, or for Ireland. Would the gentleman consider such a stipulation, although in the nature of a contract, as amounting to a law of the land? But, perhaps, he said, he should be told that that which is paramount to the law of the land, is not paramount to the Constitution, and that the Constitution prohibits the cession of a State or part of a State to a foreign Power. It was unquestionably true, whatever might be his opinion, that such is not the universal opinion; although it might perhaps be proved by the event, that as the United States had heretofore acquired territory by treaty, we have also parted with territory by treaty—as in the instance of Moose Island, and it may be, in the instance of the new boundary line to be run between us and Canada, that it may be so run as to take off part of the territory which was a part of the United States—yes, a part of the good old thirteen United States.

But, the gentleman had said something of the effect of a contract of an individual on an oath previously taken. What analogy, Mr. R. asked, was there between the absurd and preposterous conduct of an individual who attempts to tie himself up by an oath from imprudence, from the gambling-table, from the bottle, from squandering his estate, &c., and the acts of Government, especially as those acts are affected by the acts of two branches of the Government farthest removed from the people, who do not speak their sense as much as we do? Mr. R. here expressed a doubt whether, from having been out of the habit of speaking and having overstrained his voice, he had been able to make himself understood. He then adverted to the observation of the gentleman from South Carolina, that the President and Senate have an unquestionable right to put an end to the calamities of war by making a Treaty of Peace, over which this House could have no control. Mr. R. agreed with that gentleman, that the exercise of the power to put an end to the calamities of war, was the most important ever granted by a free people, except the exercise of the power to declare war. He agreed also with the gentleman, after Congress had declared war, the President and Senate might by treaty restore the state of peace; but he could not agree with the gentleman, that a treaty, although it should confine itself to what the gentleman called a contract, was paramount to law, and competent to repeal existing laws. Suppose that the Treaty of Peace had been a treaty of alliance, and had stipulated that the United States should levy an army of an hundred thousand men, and that they should be sent to the Continent to aid the British, Prussian, and Austrian arms on the plains of Waterloo—would this House have been bound to raise the men? Would Congress have been bound to provide the means of maintaining them? Certainly not.

In the declaration of war, it had been argued, by the gentleman from South Carolina, that the House had acted in a judicial capacity. In a judicial capacity! exclaimed Mr. R. He had heard it, he said, in and out of this House, questioned whether this House acted judiciously in declaring war, but he never heard it before suggested whether or not they had acted judicially on that occasion. He had never before heard it doubted, whether the Congress in passing any act, acted judicially or legislatively. [Mr. CALHOUN here made a brief explanation and statement of the extent of his position.] Mr. R. expressed his obligation to the gentleman for having stated his argument exactly as he had at first understood it. He would put it to this House, to the nation, to every man, woman, and child in the nation. Suppose the Treaty of London had been unsuspended by the truce of Amiens, would the declaration of war with Great Britain have put an end to that treaty? It would;—and would that act have been a judicial act, when the consent of the President and Senate was necessary to our acting at all? Did the gentleman mean to say, continued Mr. R., that when the Treaty with France was repealed by an act making war, during Mr. Adams's administration, it was repealed by a judicial act? Was it possible? Was there a man wide awake who could advance such an opinion? This House, he said, acted judicially when it decided on the qualifications of a member; the Senate when it tried an impeachment. But how could that be a judicial act which reads—Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c. Go to the Secretary of State's office, said Mr. R., if the rolls be still in existence, and see in what that act differs from any other—the title is as plain, the parchment as smooth. This act, which repealed an existing treaty, which treaty could not be revived after peace, unless renewed and again ratified, differs in no respect of form or solemnity from the simplest law ever made for the relief of a petitioner before this House. It does not differ from any other legislative act; and you have no judicial power, as far as my recollection now supplies me, beyond the right to try the title to a member's seat, and the right to expel a refractory and disorderly member.

Mr. R. said he did not mean to enter into the comparison between the constitution of Great Britain and that of the United States, considering it irrelevant. Mr. R. agreed that our Constitution was to be found in the charter, and in the practice under the Constitution, whether legislative or judicial, provided the precedents are taken from good Constitutional times—for he would never take precedents under any administration during times of great turbulence or excitement, when the best of us are under temptations, to which most of us yield, of carrying our passions and prejudices into public life. With all due submission to the gentleman from South Carolina, and to this House, Mr. R. said he did declare that the President and Senate did not and never had possessed the power, by any contract with a foreign Power, of repealing any law of the land, or enacting any law in its stead. This he said, was his opinion of this great Constitutional question; he had expressed it in this hasty way, under the excitement of the abhorrence—he hoped the gentleman would pardon him; it had nothing personal in it—of the abhorrence he felt at the doctrine which the gentleman had uttered on this floor—a doctrine which there was a time when it would have been called highly federal doctrine; and certainly not the less objectionable to Mr. R. on that account, either at that time or this—the doctrine that, so long as they could find another power to contract with, the President and Senate might exercise a power paramount to all law, though not to the Constitution. This was too dangerous a power to be given to the President and Senate under such a sweeping clause. If this bill had passed through this House sub silentio, if it had been carried or rejected, he should never have thought much of it; for it would never have assumed to him that aspect, which it had done since this morning—since the gentleman had asserted, that so long as they confined themselves to the legitimate sphere of contract, the President and Senate might exercise a power superior to all law whatever.

Mr. R. said, he was happy to find, however, that the gentleman had, in a degree, dissipated the horrid phantom which had so much alarmed not his imagination but his judgment. The gentleman had admitted, that there was a certain influence—a certain Constitutional check on the President and Senate of the United States—for example, impeachment as regarded the President, and public opinion as regarded the Senate—and that the spirit of the Constitution would at all times meliorate the power which, in the gentleman's opinion, the President and Senate possessed of violating every law of the land. Mr. R. granted that this was the case, and that the first reflection on it had caused Mr. R. himself to depreciate this bill below its actual importance—for he really had thought the House was making a great deal out of nothing, swelling a molehill into a mountain—until he heard the debate, when he became convinced, in so far as the power of the House of Representatives was important in the Constitution of the United States, so far as it behooves the House of Representatives to hold the power which had been conferred on them, for the nation's good, by the nation; that, so far, this was a question of importance. That the time should ever come when the President of the United States should dare to negotiate a treaty which would meet with the decided reprobation of the people of the country and their Representatives, was another question; that the time should ever come when the House of Representatives would ever have the incivility to refuse to pass laws to carry into effect such a treaty, is also another question. I do not believe, said he, (addressing the Speaker,) that either of these periods will happen in my life time, or in yours; because I believe, sir—I hope I am not mistaken—that the good sense of the people of the United States, if it please God to permit us to remain in peace—that their good sense will, in spite of all the efforts to swell up great standing armies, mighty navies, heavy taxes, and to advance the glory (as it is called) of the Government under which I live, in the blood and misery of the people—that they will put an end, as they have once before put an end to such projects, the same in kind but differing in degree—differing indeed, because infinitely below what I have seen for some time past agitated. And whether the House of Representatives declare with the honorable gentlemen on the other side of the House, that we have the power, or with my friend from North Carolina, that we have not the power or the right to pass this bill—during your life-time and mine, the Constitution will not be violated. This bill, Mr. R. repeated, was not of much importance in its matter, but in the manner of its discussion. By way of pinning the honorable gentleman down, said he, let me conclude the few crude remarks I have to make, by this question; suppose that a part of the contract by the late treaty had been, that each party should burn, sink, or dismantle an equal number of ships-of-the-line, frigates, and so on—that provision would require no appropriation;—or, suppose the treaty had contained a stipulation to destroy all our fleet, provided Great Britain would destroy an equal number of hers—this would have required no appropriation; it would have been within the legitimate sphere of contracts; it would have been a bargain; it would have even had reciprocity; it would have kept the word of promise to the ear, but broke it to the hope. But then, said Mr. R., comes in the power of impeachment—the great remedy; I have no idea of it—it has been tried and found wanting, in the case of a member of the other House, and in the case of a high judicial officer. The power of impeachment, he said, appeared to him to be not the daily bread, but the extreme medicine of the Constitution. He had no faith in it—he had no faith in a course of mercury, to restore health and vigor to that constitution which was broken down by disease—nor did he believe, if such a stipulation as he had represented had been found in a treaty, that a majority of this House could have been found to vote for an impeachment. Impeachment, Mr. R. said, extends to loss of office, to disqualification; that may be a terrible punishment to the young and aspiring; but to those who are retiring from the political theatre, amidst the plaudits of a great part of the nation over which they preside, such a punishment had no terrors. Mr. R. concluded by saying, he believed he had trespassed on the House too long; he could not, however, repress the expression of his horror at the doctrines which had been advanced—doctrines, if they prevailed, subversive not only of the Constitution of the United States, but of all free government whatever.

Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, spoke as follows:

Mr. Speaker, as the vote which I shall give upon this bill, will differ from those which will be given by those friends with whom I have the pleasure generally to act, I owe it to them and to myself to explain, as briefly as possible, the reasons of that vote, leaving the general argument to others more able and willing to discuss it. When this subject was first started in the House; when this bill was first introduced, and it was observed by many gentlemen that no bill was necessary, that the convention was already the law of the land, without much reflection I inclined to that opinion; concluding that what was already the law of the land, could not, by any act of ours, be more the law of the land. But, sir, when, in the course of debate, I heard my honorable friend from North Carolina (Mr. GASTON) speak of the moral obligation which this House was under to appropriate money to carry any treaty stipulation into effect, which might require the aid of Congress, and of the awful responsibility we should incur, were we to refuse to make such appropriation, he appeared to acknowledge a case where a treaty was not complete without legislative aid, and that the House might incur the responsibility of refusing such aid; my first impression I therefore thought wrong, and with the treaty, the bill, and the Constitution, before me, I was determined to investigate the subject attentively on its merits, with such light, however dim, as the Supreme bestower of every good gift had seen fit to impart to me. Of the opinion out of doors and of the times, I know nothing; to confess to you the truth, sir, I was afraid to recur to opinions of other times, lest they should have been produced by an excitement unfavorable to correct conclusions in politics. The result of my investigation on this subject is: that whenever a treaty or convention does, by any of its provisions, encroach upon any of the enumerated powers vested by the Constitution in the Congress of the United States, or any of the laws by them enacted in execution of those powers, such treaty or convention, after being ratified, must be laid before Congress, and such provisions cannot be carried into effect without an act of Congress. For instance, whenever a treaty affected duties on imports, enlarging or diminishing them, as the present one did to diminish; whenever a treaty went to regulate commerce with foreign nations, as that expressly did with one, as the power to lay duties and the power to regulate commerce are expressly given to Congress, such provisions of such treaty must receive the sanction of Congress before they can be considered as obligatory and as part of the municipal law of this country. And this construction is strengthened by a part of the general power given to Congress, following the enumerated powers, "to make all laws which shall be 'necessary and proper, for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or office thereof.' In other words, for carrying into execution the treaty-making power (that being among the other powers) in all cases where it has been exercised on subjects, placed by the Constitution within the control of the legislative department. This construction is further strengthened by the concession of honorable gentlemen, in one case, that where appropriations of money are necessary for carrying the provisions of any treaty into effect, there legislative provision is necessary. Now, sir, to concede that the sanction of Congress is necessary in one case of enumerated and specified power, is to concede it in all such cases. Nor, sir, can any serious inconvenience arise from this construction. As to negotiations with foreign Powers, our Ministers will always know the peculiar structure of our Government; nor can foreign Ministers, who may ever be sent to treat with us, be ignorant thereof. Besides, the distinction, as to the several kinds of treaties, is well known; some, respecting solely our external relations, or the intercourse between our Government and that of a foreign Power, will execute themselves, or are perfect without any legislative aid; and it can instantly be determined, from the nature of the provisions, when legislative aid is necessary. Further, sir, your Government has well understood this distinction. Some treaties they, by their proclamations, merely ratify and confirm, where legislative aid is necessary, as in the present case; others, they not only ratify and confirm, but enjoin an observance thereof upon all our citizens, as will be seen by turning to the ratification, by Mr. Jefferson, of several treaties published in the seventh volume United States laws. The fear that the President and Senate (they must both, or two-thirds of the latter, concur) will agree with the House in passing an improper law on the subject of a treaty which they had before ratified, cannot be well founded. There is much more reason to fear that they may be induced to ratify a treaty requiring legislative provision, which the House ought to refuse. Should a case of that kind occur, while I have the honor to be one of the Representatives of the people, I shall have no hesitation, with my brethren, to interpose ourselves between the Executive and the people, in the defence of their rights, or the freedom of our country. Far, then, from shrinking from what my honorable friend is pleased to call an awful responsibility, I should think it a sacred duty to meet the crisis, resist the encroachment, and leave the consequences with God. I never will consent that the House of Representatives of the people shall become a mere Parliament of Paris, to register the edicts of the President. I shall vote for the bill.

Mr. MILLS said, nothing had been further from his intention than to take a part in the present debate. But although he had bestowed but little attention to the subject, he begged the indulgence of the House for a moment to the few remarks which the discussion had suggested to his mind, and which had not been noticed by those who had preceded him in the debate. Crude and indigested as these remarks may appear, he could venture to engage they would have at least the merit of brevity. Mr. M. said, he was opposed to the passage of the bill; not because he felt the least disposition to impede the execution of the treaty, lame and imbecile as it is, to which it relates, but because he foresaw the danger of embarrassing the other branches of the Government by this interference, and because he believed, as well from the structure of the Government, as from the express provisions of the Constitution, we could not interpose our authority in the way contemplated by this bill, without attempting an unwarrantable exercise of power not delegated to this House by the Constitution. It would be not merely an act of useless legislation, but of downright usurpation. Gentlemen had indulged themselves at great length in search of arguments to prove the inexpediency of vesting the absolute and uncontrolled power of making treaties, in the President and Senate, and had taxed their imaginations for proof of the mischiefs which might result from the exercise of this power. Sir, we are not at liberty to go into that inquiry. The question is not, where ought this important prerogative of sovereignty to be lodged? But, where is it deposited by the Constitution? We are not sitting as a convention to make such a distribution of powers as we think best calculated to secure the preservation of liberty, but we are called upon to exercise those powers already vested in us by the instrument which we have solemnly sworn to support.

The practice of other Governments is equally irrelevant to the present inquiry, and especially of those Governments whose forms of proceeding, and the distributions of whose powers, bear but a remote analogy to our own. Ours is a federative Government, composed of distinct and separate sovereignties, and clothed with no powers, excepting those which are expressly delegated by the Constitution, or which necessarily result from them. It is an anomaly among existing Governments, and from the manner in which it was formed, Mr. M. said, he thought it might easily be shown, that it was never the intention of the convention to vest the House of Representatives with any participation in the treaty-making power.

Thirteen independent States, each possessing all the attributes of sovereignty—the power of making treaties among the rest—varying in size, in population, in wealth, and in strength, of different habits, interests, and pursuits, assemble to form a Constitution for their mutual protection and defence. The wise men to whom the accomplishment of this great object was intrusted had to contend with the prejudices of the people, and the jealousies of the States, to reconcile interests at variance with each other, and so to combine and shape them as not to sacrifice those of one section of country to the supposed advantage of others. It was, of course, a system of compromise and conciliation—each surrendering something for the good of all.

It was, therefore, for the purpose of protecting the interests and guarding the rights of the States that the Constitution requires the assent of two-thirds of the members of the Senate to the ratification of a treaty. It is not because the Senate are a co-ordinate branch of the Legislature that they are called upon to advise the President upon this subject, but because they represent the sovereignty of the States; and in requiring the assent of two-thirds of the Senate, it was believed that no treaty would ever be ratified unless it was for the interest of two-thirds of the States. But, said Mr. M., adopt the doctrine contended for by the gentlemen on the other side—admit this House to a participation of this power, and what would be the consequence? Why, sir, it would be in the power of four States only, out of the eighteen, now composing the Union, to defeat the ratification of a treaty which had received the sanction of the President and two-thirds of the Senate. Yes, sir, although the Senate, representing the respective States, might have given their unanimous advice to the President, it would still be in the power of the Representatives of Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, and Virginia, to prevent its being carried into effect. Where, sir, are the rights of the respective States, so sedulously guarded by the Constitution; where is the security of the small States; or, where the interests of the commercial ones, if a treaty made for the protection of those great objects is liable to be defeated by a combination of this sort? The supposition is monstrous. No, sir, the House of Representatives have no more right to interfere than they would have if the Constitution had required the advice of two-thirds of the Governors of the respective States to the confirmation of a treaty. It is the assent of the States, and not of the people numerically, which was intended to be secured.

Mr. M. said, the remarks he had already made were founded principally upon the structure of our Government, and what must have been the intention of its founders. But from an examination of the Constitution itself, and a comparison of its various parts, he had been astonished that any difference of opinion should exist upon this subject. He should not, however, detain the House with a labored argument upon this part of the case, inasmuch as the reasoning of the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. HOPKINSON,) and those who had preceded him upon the same side, must have produced a conviction upon the minds of all over whom he could hope to have any influence, and must be, in his apprehension, conclusive upon all who take the Constitution for their guide. That instrument declares, that "all treaties made or to be made under the authority of the United States shall be the supreme law of the land." It expressly vests in the "President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, provided two-thirds of the members present concur, the power to make treaties." The treaty with Great Britain, now under consideration, has been made and ratified precisely in the form thus prescribed. The inference is, therefore, irresistible: It is the supreme law of the land; and no power on earth can render it more obligatory. It is a compact entered into between two sovereign independent nations, acting under their respective lawful authorities; it is perfect and complete in all its parts, has received the sanction of each party, and is proclaimed to the world by your President, acting under the same instrument by which we hold our seats, not as an inchoate and incomplete act, requiring any further ceremony to render it valid, but as made and concluded, and already binding each party to its respective stipulations.

The inconsistencies arising out of the construction of the Constitution, contended for by the advocates of this bill, Mr. M. said, were numerous and palpable. He would instance but one or two: By the bill, the House undertake to put a construction upon the treaty. We pass the bill and send it to the Senate. That body, upon the ground that our construction is not correct, refuse, by a majority of one, to pass a bill for carrying into effect a treaty to which two-thirds have already given their deliberate consent—what would be the result? Would the treaty cease to operate, and lose its binding efficacy? Again, suppose the bill passes both the Senate and House, and your President refuses his sanction on the very ground that you are trenching upon his legitimate authority, and assuming a power not delegated to Congress. Where is then your treaty; and how stand your relations with Great Britain? A doctrine so replete with absurdity cannot be correct. Let us not, sir, employ our time in the vain effort to legislate where we have no power and can produce no effect. Let each department of the Government confine itself to the sphere in which the Constitution has placed it. Employment enough may be found in the rightful exercise of authority, while nothing but disorder and confusion will result from its abuse.

Mr. M. said, it would be easy to show that the practice of our Government under the Constitution, had been conformable to the principles for which he contended; but as the hour of adjournment had arrived, and he had already trespassed upon the patience of the House longer than he intended, he would detain them no further.

Mr. REYNOLDS said he rose with some diffidence to express his opinion on the great question now before the House, particularly after the great display made by the gentlemen from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) and from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) who had just sat down. But whenever a great Constitutional question is involved, Mr. R. said, he would always take the liberty to deliver his sentiments while he had the honor of a seat in this House. He did not mean, however, to enter into the general discussion, which the question now assumed by the eloquence of the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) at this late hour, but merely to state the grounds on which his opinion rested. Mr. R. said it was time enough to meet the extreme case put by the honorable gentleman, when it should really and absolutely occur. And whenever Ministers, who were appointed to negotiate a treaty with a foreign Power, would cede a State, or part of a State, or any territory whatever, and that sanctioned by the President and two-thirds of the Senate, he hoped to God there would always be found a redeeming spirit in this House, to check at once a course so enormous and unconstitutional. Mr. R. admitted, that there are, and may be treaties which this House may be bound to register, if you please to call it, and adopt as the supreme law of the land; and those, in his opinion, are exclusively treaties of peace, that do not require any act of legislation to carry the same into effect. But, he insisted, that all treaties of commerce and alliance, or those which required this House to appropriate the money of their constituents, did, and ought to have the sanction of Congress before they could be viewed as complete, or "the supreme law of the land." And it was on this ground, Mr. R. said, he was opposed in toto to the doctrines advanced by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) in favor of the treaty-making power. But, said the gentleman, with some degree of triumph, the President of the United States has already considered the commercial treaty as complete, because he has published the same to the world as the law of the land, and has merely transmitted a copy of it to this House without any documents to act upon. Sir, said Mr. R., this Message is the strongest evidence that can be adduced in favor of the position I have taken. The President of the United States knew well what he was about, and the course he has taken speaks volumes on the subject. What does the Message say, Mr. Speaker? It announces to us that the treaty has been duly ratified, and recommends to this House to pass such laws as may be required to carry the same into effect. Sir, this is a treaty regulating commerce between this country and Great Britain. The Constitution has confided the regulation of foreign commerce to the Congress of the United States. It is a municipal law, over which this House has a right to act. I shall therefore, sir, vote for the bill on your table, although I do not deem it of much importance as to the validity of the treaty now under consideration, or that its passage is absolutely necessary on the present occasion, but for the purpose of recording my vote in support of the great Constitutional authority of this House.

Mr. HARDY appealed to the plain common sense and intelligence of the House, whether the bill upon which they were lavishing so much of their time and exertions, was not entirely superfluous and nugatory. Here was a treaty, a contract fairly, and with full deliberation, concluded between the lawful sovereignties of this country and Great Britain, ratified as the Constitutional law of the country directed, by the President, with the advice of two-thirds of the Senate, and by the President proclaimed to the people as the law of the land, with an injunction for the due observance of it—containing nothing that interfered with the municipal laws of the country—no regulation that might not be carried into immediate effect without legislative interference—involving no call whatsoever for money, and yet tenaciously held up as an object of legislation, and made the subject of a bill which did little more than re-echo it. He was as much aware as the gentlemen who supported the measure, that the treaty-making power could not, by a treaty, lawfully make war or impose taxes or encroach upon those powers which the Constitution had deposited in Congress; but it was no less true that the Constitution declares in unequivocal terms that the President may make treaties, and that no restriction or limitation whatsoever, to his power in that respect, is specified in that instrument, which is sufficiently declaratory of the extent of the power, inasmuch as it says that treaties made in the form and with the authorities already mentioned shall be the law of the land. Some of those honorable gentlemen, by way of smoothing the passage of the bill through the House, had argued that it was so far at least unobjectionable, that it could do no hurt, that if it did no good it could do no harm; but Mr. H. reminded the House of the eminence on which it stood; that it was composed of the assembled representatives of the nation, sent there to deliberate and to resolve upon its most important concerns, and he therefore deprecated, as it would be a dereliction of the high character of such an august assembly, their gravely deliberating upon nothing. He respected the dignity of the body too much to give his assent to their entertaining a measure, for no better reason, than because it was harmless. Besides, that act which now appeared so harmless, might, ultimately, turn out to be very mischievous, as a precedent; and this violation of the Constitution, in a thing, no matter how trifling, might, hereafter, be made the ground of a more daring encroachment. On this point, he warned the House to be cautious, to guard, not only the main body, but the out-posts; and to reflect in due time, that some twenty or thirty years to come, this precedent might be brought forward, to the incalculable injury, perhaps the ruin of the Constitution.

Gentlemen had said, that, on a commercial subject, no treaty could be obligatory, because the Constitution had assigned to Congress the regulation of commerce. Where then, said he, will gentlemen stop? To Congress, say they, is delegated the exclusive jurisdiction over everything. According to their construction, therefore, the treaty-making power was impotent, a nullity, it could do nothing; it could not make peace, because peace repeals war, the right of making which is delegated to Congress: and it could not form alliances, for the same reason. But gentlemen, he observed, seemed not to recollect the old logical maxim, that he who proves too much, proves nothing. The President, say they, cannot repeal the excise!—no; but the President can make a peace without the concurrence of that House, and fortunate it was, that he could do so.

H. OF R.

We now, said Mr. H., feel the happy effects of that power, and conceive that a treaty of peace has been accomplished without any encroachments, or pretended encroachments on our Congressional acts. The power to treat generally, he said, was vested in the President by the Constitution—but to the law of nations it was left, to determine the limitations of that power. If it be true, said Mr. H., that by the terms of the Constitution of the United States, this treaty is already the law of the land, then is the treaty guaranteed by that Constitution; and yet gentlemen insist that it is not valid, and that this House ought to be consulted. By the Constitution we are forbidden to be heard in the subject, yet they will have it otherwise, and by this species of indirection, this left-handed course, bring the treaty under our legislative cognizance. Sir, I say we cannot do indirectly that which we are forbidden to do directly. Treaties might be made, no doubt, he said, for the execution of which it might be necessary to call upon the House to make laws; offensive and defensive treaties for instance, which could not otherwise be carried into effect; but when, as in the present case, the treaty was complete, and capable of executing itself, nothing of the kind was necessary.

As to the instances which had been adduced of Congress being called upon to enact laws for carrying treaties into effect, he believed that there was not one of them similar to this. The case of Jay's Treaty was not. The Federalists supported that on two grounds: one that it was a good treaty; the other that, whether good or bad, it would not be consistent with the honor of the country to reject it; but it never was brought forward as this is, a re-echo of itself in the shape of a bill. And as to the cases taken from the proceedings of the British records, the organization of that Government was in all respects so different from that of ours, that it was impossible to argue fairly or conclusively from the one, to the other.

The question was taken on ordering the bill to a third reading, about three o'clock, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 86, nays 69, as follows:

WEDNESDAY, January 10.

Mr. LANGDON presented a petition of Jones, Guernsey, & Co., and Billy Todd & Co., manufacturers of woollen cloths, in the State of Vermont, praying that woollen goods (superfine broad cloths excepted) may be prohibited from being imported into the United States from foreign countries, or that additional duties may be imposed upon their importation.

Mr. PINKNEY presented a petition of the cotton manufacturers in the city of Baltimore, praying that the importation of all cotton goods from places beyond the Cape of Good Hope, and those of European manufacture, interfering with those manufactured within the United States, may be prohibited, or that additional duties may be laid on the importation of said articles.—Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. PINKNEY presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the State of Maryland, who were severally wounded while in the military service of the United States, during the late war with Great Britain, praying for pensions, or such other relief as Congress may think proper to grant.—Referred to the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. MCKEE, from a select committee, reported a bill authorizing the President of the United States to renew the lease of John Bate to the saline near the Wabash river, for a term not exceeding seven years; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PLEASANTS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a resolution requesting the President of the United States to present medals to Captain Charles Stewart and the officers of the frigate Constitution; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on the resolution requesting the President of the United States to present a gold medal to Captain James Biddle and the officers of the Hornet.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, "concerning the convention to regulate the commerce between the territories of the United States and His Britannic Majesty," in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

COMMERCE WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

The engrossed bill to regulate the commerce of the United States, according to the Convention of Commerce concluded with Great Britain on the 3d day of July last, was read the third time, and the question was stated "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. EASTON said, he had intended yesterday to deliver his sentiments in relation to the subject-matter of the bill upon which the vote of the House was about to pass; not having then been so fortunate as to gain the floor, he now had risen to advocate its passage, and, for that purpose, begged the indulgence of the House; he asked not only the indulgence but the attention of the House to the arguments he was about to urge upon the occasion. He considered the passage of the bill very important, as it regarded the powers, under the Constitution, delegated to Congress; the powers delegated to the President and Senate; the powers delegated to the courts of justice; and highly important as it regarded the rights and liberties of the people of this nation.

He apprehended very injurious consequences might, at some future period, result to the nation by a contrary course. The convention being reciprocal and beneficial, it was the avowed intention and desire of all parties to carry it into effect. It had been said, by gentlemen on both sides of the House, that the convention was, of itself, the supreme law of the land, while a majority had inclined to the opinion that legislative provisions are necessary to give it force and efficiency, though some doubted as to the expediency of legislating at all upon the subject. I am of opinion, said Mr. E., that it is not a treaty until it shall have been sanctioned by the Congress of the United States, by a legislative act, to carry it into effect.

The precedent about to be established, on the present occasion, was, of all others, the most favorable to the security, or pernicious in the extreme to the future liberties of the American people.

What are the powers, by the Constitution, delegated to Congress? And what are those delegated to the treaty-making power? In adverting to the Constitution, it will be found that "all legislative powers are vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives." "The Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations." Surely, then, this power is not granted to any other authority. It cannot be given to two separate, distinct, and independent authorities. If it is given to Congress, it is not given to the treaty-making power, to the exclusion of Congress; it may be given to both to act in concert; it is not given to the one, to act to the exclusion of the other. This is a Government of laws; it is not a Government by compacts, by conventions, or by treaties concluded independent of the powers of Congress, in violation of the Constitution, and beyond the control of the supreme authority of the land, the sovereignty of this nation. What is the present convention? It is "a convention to regulate commerce between the territories of the United States and his Britannic Majesty;" it is then an agreement, upon the face of it, "to regulate commerce with a foreign nation." The President "has power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties; provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur." It is not ordained, in this clause of the Constitution, that such treaties are made "under the authority" of the United States, nor that a treaty thus made, shall "be the supreme law of the land." It would be, indeed, extraordinary, if the destinies and liberties of this nation were to rest upon the will of the treaty-forming power; I say treaty-forming power, because it is but another expression to convey a correct idea.

A power composed (as the case might happen) of the Executive and thirteen Senators, a less number by far than a majority of that honorable body; a power specially given to one authority, under the Constitution, cannot be construed to be given to another; such a construction would introduce into the Government an irregularity and an inconsistency fatal to its harmony, and destructive in its consequences. The President has a qualified negative upon the laws of Congress; the Senate are a part of Congress. Is not the regulation of commerce trusted to the proper authority? Is it not in safe hands? Will you, can you, treat the authority given to Congress by the Constitution, "to regulate commerce," as a dead letter?

If this construction prevails, is the treaty made without the concurrence of the President and Senate? Shall it be binding without the assent of Congress? If that assent is given, it is a treaty made under the authority of the United States.

If it is withheld, it is a treaty made under the authority of the President and Senate, and not a treaty made under the authority of the United States. I should regret, and who are they that would not regret, to see the authority and destinies of this nation placed in the hands of an Executive and a Senate.

If the treaty-making power possess the authority to make commercial and other regulations, they may go on regulating until they will have regulated this branch of the Government (the House of Representatives) out of its whole weight of influence upon the councils of the nation; their authority will become a mere carte blanche, to be filled up as the treaty-making power may think proper to dictate or direct. Congress may regulate commerce in one manner; the President and Senate, at their pleasure, change that regulation.

It is a correct principle, that subsequent laws, inconsistent with former laws, repeal such former laws, and is a rule which cannot be controverted. It is principle as sound and potent as the eternal principles of justice. But the question to be decided is, when does a treaty become a law, when has it efficacy as such, and when shall it be binding as the supreme authority of the nation? Two separate and distinct legislative authorities, independent of each other, possessing equal power, cannot, in one and the same Government, exist together. That is, if the Executive and Senate alone can legislate, it is perfectly idle to vest the legislative authority in Congress. "A house divided against itself cannot stand." Congress divided against itself must fall. Congress have power, or they have not power, to legislate. If they do possess the whole powers of legislation granted under the Constitution, of which there cannot be a question, it follows, as a certain and incontrovertible conclusion, that the President and Senate alone, forming only two branches of the legislative authority of this Government, acting in their Executive capacities, as necessarily they must do in negotiating treaties, do not possess authority to legislate independent of the House of Representatives, the immediate representatives of the people—the people have not granted such power.

It would be admitted, he presumed, that ours is the best Constitution and Government "here below;" that it is the best to be found among the nations of the earth. It may emphatically be styled a Constitution of checks and balances; the Senate, in its legislative capacity, is a check upon the House of Representatives; the President upon the Congress. There must be a concurrence, according to the provisions of the Constitution, to form a law, and laws must be made before they can be executed. On the Executive and treaty-making capacity of the President and Senate, the House of Representatives, with the Constitution in their hand, hold a check; a treaty cannot become the supreme law of the land, which is inconsistent with the Constitution, or the powers delegated to Congress by the Constitution.

"The President shall nominate, and, by and with the advice of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls." Suppose they should appoint "swarms of officers," needless and unnecessary. The appointments are complete, the officers are made; they hold the seals of office under the authority of the Constitution; they are officers to all intents and purposes, they are commissioned under the authority of the United States, their appointments do not infringe any right or trespass upon any authority delegated to Congress, and yet, in my humble opinion, Congress would not be bound in honor, or otherwise, to sanction such a procedure by originating an appropriation bill for the outfits and expenditures of such officers. Congress are not bound, nor is the nation bound, nor are the courts of justice bound, to consider a treaty as the law of the land, until that law has been made under the authority only competent to make laws for the people of this nation, to wit: the Congress of the United States.

It has been contended that the treaty repeals the discriminating duties, and it being concerning affairs wholly international, that the legislative acts of this Government operate wholly internally, and cannot reach or affect the domestic or internal regulations of the foreign nation; that the convention therefore is a compact, and its subject-matter a contract to which the legislative authority of this country cannot extend. I admit, said Mr. E., that all treaties when completed and carried into effect by the supreme authority of a State or Kingdom, are compacts, and form a part of the law of nations, but this nation is not bound by a contract to which it has not given its assent; the Senate do not go abroad, nor do they negotiate the terms of a treaty at home; to an honorable and beneficial treaty, the assent of Congress and of this honorable House is as easily obtained as that of the Senate; in ordinary legislation committees report bills, they go to different readings, according to the rules prescribed by the different branches of the Legislature, are rejected, or finally, with the approbation of the President, pass into laws, and become binding on the nation. The President has no legislative authority, strictly so speaking, and yet no bill can become a law without his assent, but by the consent of two-thirds of both Houses of Congress.

There is no expression in the Constitution that authorizes the Senate to ratify a treaty; the phrase used by the Constitution is, to make treaties. The question is, when shall a treaty be said to be made? Ministers and Envoys Extraordinary are appointed and commissioned to agree upon the terms of a treaty; they meet the foreign embassy in convention; they conclude a treaty. The convention with Great Britain was concluded on the third day of July, one thousand eight hundred and fifteen; it was then moulded. It was not then made, although in common parlance it is said to have been made. It was like dough unbaked. It will not be bread till it is baked. The treaty is forwarded to the President; if he disapproves of it, he returns it to those who framed it; if he likes it, he submits it to the Senate; if they approve of it, it is ratified; it is then said to be made. But it is not yet completed under the authority of the United States; it is only a treaty sub modo; it is not a treaty in effect. It does not become the property of the nation till it shall have received the sanction of the national consent, through the organs of the national will. The Constitution does not declare that a treaty made, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall be the supreme law of the land. It does not say that a treaty so concluded, so ratified, so made, or whatsoever you may please to term it, is made under the authority of the United States. It cannot be a treaty till it shall have received the sanction of the national authority under the Constitution; when it shall have received that sanction, it is then, and not till then, a treaty made under the Constitution and under the laws of the United States, and such a treaty made under their authority, to which the judicial power shall extend. They are treaties only made under the authority of the United States, which are declared to be the supreme law of the land by the Constitution, and which the judges in every State are bound to obey. For example: It might be said that a piece of parchment in printed form of a commission, filled out with the name of the incumbent, and sign manual of the Executive subscribed to it, is a commission; and yet it is not a commission under the authority of the United States until the proper seal shall be thereto set and affixed in due form of law.

Sir, the present convention is a commercial regulation, which interferes with the powers expressly delegated to the legislative authority, and therefore must receive the legislative sanction, the confirmation of Congress, before it can be binding on the people of this nation; and without which it is not competent to the President and Senate, or to the judicial authority, to enforce.

The Constitution expressly ordains, that "Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution all powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or office thereof." No department or officer coming in contact with the powers delegated to Congress by the Constitution have authority under the Government, and it would be a solecism to say we have a Government under the Constitution independent of Congress. This construction can do no injury to our Republican institutions; it may be productive of much good: it is placing it beyond the reach of the treaty-making power. To repeal this treaty by making another, no inconvenience will result, as two-thirds of the Senate have concurred in approving of it; and I should presume there can be no obstacle to the passage of the bill in that honorable body.

I perceive, sir, said Mr. E., by a bill now on the table, that the Senate propose to declare by act of Congress, "that so much of any act or acts as is contrary to the provisions of the convention shall be deemed and taken to be of no force or effect." If the treaty is a law, and, as such, binding upon the nation, the passage of such a bill is wholly unnecessary, upon the principle that subsequent laws repeal former laws in all cases where they are inconsistent with each other. And why are two-thirds of the Senate required to make a treaty? It would appear to me that as this House have not the power to negotiate a treaty, it would be scarcely proper that it should be called upon to discuss one, that two-thirds of the Senate present would not deem beneficial and honorable to the country. If a contrary construction shall prevail, and it shall be determined that a treaty made and approved by the President and Senate is of itself the supreme law of the land, then indeed can they legislate, and then indeed can they regulate commerce; and the supreme authority will be placed in the hands of the Executive, the Senate, and the courts of justice, who may also legislate without the aid, and beyond the control of Congress, make contracts, and carry into effect treaties, however odious they may be to the people, or to their immediate Representatives. This may be, I do not say it will be, the effect of this monstrous treaty-making power.

Congress may declare war; no authority is expressly given by the Constitution to make peace. If any treaty would be binding, made independent of the legislative authority, he was inclined to believe it would be a treaty of peace, and yet this would only form one exception; it would be a treaty not against the provisions of any article of the Constitution, as the power is not delegated to any other branch of the Government; it becomes the exclusive province of the treaty-making power, and does not require a law to give it validity, or to carry it into effect; it is a treaty made under the authority of the United States. The great objects in going to war are the protection of the national rights, and to secure an honorable peace. Such a peace would be acquiesced in by common consent; and the power to make peace is not a dangerous power; it is suited to the trust of the Executive alone, who would have authority, being the Commander-in-Chief of the whole military, to carry it into effect. But it is perfectly idle to talk of authority to do this, that, or the other thing, under our Constitution and form of Government, without power to carry that authority into effect. The power to act under the Constitution, is evidence of a right to act, and to act with effect. The Constitution should be construed to harmonize all its parts, and the construction which he had given would produce such harmony. It is unnecessary, and would be improper in Congress to legislate upon the treaty, to give it a construction that belongs to another authority, to the courts of judicature; any construction Congress might give it would not be binding upon the courts; yet every member who legislates upon a treaty must, in making up his opinion, whether to carry it into effect or not, give it his own construction, in order to form such opinion correctly.

In the sixth article of the Constitution it is declared, that the "Constitution, and the laws of the United States, which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby." What is the authority of the United States? The Constitution and will of the people expressed through their Representatives in the Congress of the United States; the legislative authority of the nation is that authority without which no law or treaty can become the supreme law of the land. An individual officer, a judge, a marshal, or a justice of the peace, may act under the authority of the United States, so long as he keeps himself within the pale of the Constitutional limits, and the laws of the United States enjoining the duties to be by him performed. The Constitution is the paramount law, but without the aid of Congress it becomes inoperative. A person may possess the faculty to play upon an organ, but if he has not that instrument he does not possess either the power or the means to play upon it. The President, by the Constitution, shall be Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, when called into the service of the United States; but he cannot command, if there shall not be any Army or Navy called into the service of the United States.

"The judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity, arising under the Constitution, the laws of the United States, and the treaties which shall be made under their authority." If the words "under their authority" had been omitted, their powers would not have been construed to extend to foreign treaties. Hence the judicial power cannot carry into effect a treaty not made under the authority of the Constitution and laws of the United States; a law is as necessary to the validity of a treaty as the Constitution itself.

He did not wish to be understood, that a law is necessary in all cases to the validity of a treaty; he meant to extend it only to cases where a treaty would contravene the powers delegated to Congress. If the Constitution itself gives authority to make the treaty, the treaty thus made becomes the supreme law of the land; the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, and the judicial power of the United States shall extend to it; but a treaty not thus made cannot be carried into execution by the judicial authority; they certainly would not adjudge a treaty to be made under the authority of the United States, when the treaty is made in derogation of that authority. He spoke of the authority expressly delegated to Congress.

Suppose a treaty made on a subject not prohibited nor permitted by the Constitution, as in the case of the treaty for the purchase of the province of Louisiana; that power is not expressly delegated to any authority under the Constitution, nor is it forbidden; the Constitution is silent; one of the conditions of the compact is for the payment of $15,000,000 to France; the convention is ratified; the money is not paid; is it then a treaty? It is not. It becomes a nullity if the money is withheld; but, according to the argument of some gentlemen, it is a treaty, and the supreme law of the land; and yet it is not a treaty; and so, it is a treaty, and it is not a treaty. Suppose the money paid, it is then a treaty, and not till then has it received the sanction of the legislative authority, under the Constitution, and becomes the supreme law. The treaty contains a stipulation that the inhabitants shall be admitted into the Union. It is the supreme law of the land; and the courts are not enabled to carry that clause of the treaty into effect; it requires farther legislative provisions.

It has been said, sir, that the President has ratified the convention by Great Britain, that it has been approved of by the Senate, and sent forth to the public by a proclamation as a treaty; and if it is not a treaty the President knows not what he is about. Sir, said Mr. E., the President does know what he is about; that wise, intelligent, and upright Chief Magistrate, who has long enjoyed the confidence of this nation, was a member of the convention which framed the Constitution, and understands the subject correctly. In his communication of the treaty to the Senate and House of Representatives, on the 23d day of December last, he says: "I lay before Congress copies of a proclamation notifying the convention concluded with Great Britain, on the 3d day of July last, and that the same has been duly ratified; and I recommend to Congress such legislative provisions as the convention may call for on the part of the United States."

He who helped to make the Constitution recommends to Congress legislative provisions in relation to this treaty, and such as it may call for, on the part of the United States.

The principles for which I contend, Mr. Speaker, said Mr. E., are briefly these: A treaty though made has not force, and cannot be said to be made under the national authority, without a law of Congress giving it that authority, or to carry it into effect; that is, in all cases where the treaty in its provisions interferes with, or contravenes any of the powers expressly delegated to the legislative authority, or where from the nature of the treaty itself it requires legislative provision; but if the treaty is not contrary to the provisions of the Constitution, and does not contravene any of the powers delegated to Congress, and is of the description that it can be carried into effect by the President alone, or by the President and Senate, or by the judicial authority, without the aid of Congress, legislation in such cases becomes wholly useless; treaties thus made are the supreme law of the land, which every citizen is bound to respect and to obey.

MR. CUTBERT.—From the temper discovered by the House, at the introduction of this bill, I had expected but little discussion. This expectation has been disappointed. Discussion has been opened and extended. Those who advocate the principles which make the bill necessary, can no longer withhold themselves from the debate. When my friend from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) yesterday resumed his seat, I felt myself under the influence of a strong impulse to reply, but restrained, because I participated in the general anxiety to listen to a gentleman who has recently appeared in this hall. I now rise for the purpose of such reply, which I shall enter upon without preamble, and accomplish with brevity. First, then, I demand that which cannot well be refused to me, and which being granted, all that I desire to establish must of necessity follow. What, then, do I demand? It is this: Are the principles of our Republican Constitution of Government founded in the reason and nature of things, necessary to the conservation of public liberty, the safeguard of the general interests, and the security of the equal rights of the citizen? Has it been the result of a spirit of liberty, chastened by sober wisdom, and a sober wisdom animated by the spirit of liberty; that all our Constitution and law rests upon this principle—"All legislative power shall be vested in a Congress, consisting of a Senate and House of Representatives?" Is this structure of Government, this instrument of the powers of legislation that, without which we can form no idea of civil and political liberty, and a safe guardianship of the general interests? Yes, with confidence, I demand if there be any in this House who will question these principles. Certainly none! How strange, wild, and contradictory then does it appear, that having acknowledged that our republican constitution of Government, founded on the reason of things and the nature of man, can allow only one plan of legislation to be consistent with the liberties and interests of the people, any one should immediately add, that this same constitution provides another and entirely different mode of legislating. Yes, I say, it does appear absurd and contradictory, that it being necessarily granted that our Constitution has vested all the liberties of the citizen and the interests of the community on this principle, that all legislative power shall be vested in a Congress composed of one popular branch, the immediate representatives of the people, styled the House of Representatives, and another branch representing the same sovereignties, under the style of the Senate—it should be added, that this same Constitution provides the making of laws by the Chief Magistrate and the Senate, without reference to the immediate Representatives of the people. For such are the claims for the treaty-making power, made by those who advocate its extent in this debate. As what may not become the subject of a treaty; commercial regulation, the raising of armies and of navies, extension of the rights of citizenship? What, then, are there to be no grand and fixed principles of liberty, which, settling on their foundations, from day to day, shall acquire with the progress of time an immovable firmness! No grand principles, which, incorporating themselves with the soul of the American citizen, shall make a part of his very nature, and revolting into strong action, on violation, shall thus become the sanction of their own preservation? May that plan of policy which ought to be believed to have cast its roots so deeply, and taken so strong a hold, be torn up thus easily, I had almost said, thus wantonly? In fine, may a treaty with a foreign despot, petty or mighty, subvert to its base the legislative authority on which depends the entire scheme of our polity and liberty?

For what is there that may not become (as has been said) the subject of a treaty; commercial regulation, the raising of money, of armies, and of fleets, the franchises of citizenship, and whatever properly belongs to, and is most interesting in legislation? My friend from South Carolina, clear, rapid, ardent, and impatient in his intellectual operations, is, perhaps, carried too strongly towards metaphysical subtlety and the soundness and completeness of theory. If from this cause he has here erred, I would beg leave to remind him, that wretched indeed would be the condition of the human race could the great principles of Government be understood only by a few minds, subtle, refined, and comprehensive. Wretched, indeed, would be the condition of the human race, did the public liberty rest only in the refined subtleties of metaphysics. My friend, with the higher and more solid attributes of genius, is not without some of its shining defects. Fertile in the invention of topics to sustain the cause he advocates, he is inclined to select those which do not readily present themselves to common apprehension. Recommended as they are to himself by the beauty and freshness of novelty, he is aware that they carry the minds of those to whom he addresses himself by a kind of surprise, producing a quick and lively impression. But such reasoning should be regarded with suspicion. Thus, then, we are told, that a treaty being a contract to which two nations are parties, must be of higher and more solemn obligation than a law which is the act of one nation. Such a treaty contract, it is said, being of a higher nature, and more binding force than a law, may repeal a law, cannot require the sanction of a law, or by a law be invalidated. How fallacious this reasoning! Who in this country, I ask, is the party concerned, as principal in a treaty contract? The people. Who their agent? The treaty-making power. Where are the instructions of the agent to be found? In the Constitution. And can a contract be considered as complete and of binding force, that has not received the sanction which, according to its character, is required by the instructions of the principal. What inferior contract can dissolve, or in any manner affect the conditions of that imperial contract, the constitution of republican Government, in which the citizens by a solemn act engage themselves to each other, and prescribe limits to those who administer their affairs? It is this contract on which rests all Government, which gives force to all laws and life and validity to all other contracts.

But the faith of the nation we are told is pledged by a treaty. Ah! that is the question in discussion: Is the faith of the nation pledged? Certainly, the faith of the nation is not pledged where a treaty requires the sanction of a law, until that sanction is afforded. It is the seal manual that stamps the hitherto incomplete engagement. Foreign nations are bound to understand the constitution of the Government of the people with whom they treat. Our Constitution is the credentials borne in hand by our negotiators.

The error (as it appears to me) of those who deny the necessity of a law of Congress to give full force to treaties which embrace subjects properly of legislation, has its commencement in this: that they do not comprehend in their view of the Constitution its different parts, but, seizing on the treaty-making power alone, carry it to an irrational extent, and with a violent invasion over all the rest which are forced to yield. The Constitution is then rightly construed when its several principles, all set in operation, are properly adjusted, balanced, and harmonized. Each must receive its due weight and force according to its weight and relation to others.

With regard to the law under consideration, the members of this House may be divided into several classes. To those (of whom I am one) who believe the sanction of a law in this case necessary, no persuasion need be addressed. There is another class who believe that in cases where treaties affect internal regulations, their legislative interposition is demanded. Let such consider that it would be extremely difficult if not impossible to deny that character to this treaty, and that it is the less hazardous course to act on that presumption. There are others again who regard the passage of a law in many of these cases as a matter of form. Let such reflect that forms are not unfrequently the best protection to what is substantiated.

H. OF R.

I conclude with a doctrine which may excite objection and clamor, but which, I with confidence predict, will become the doctrine of the nation. What is the doctrine? It is this: this House is the grand inquest of the nation, and in public discussion upon bills must examine whether the Constitution has been preserved in its integrity, and the honor of the nation unviolated in treaties.

Mr. TUCKER said that he should not have risen to offer to the House any remarks on the subject before it, if he had not conceived that there were some important considerations that had not yet been presented to its view. Gentlemen, he said, have so eagerly entered upon the discussion of the general question in relation to the treaty-making power, a question of the greatest magnitude and interest, that their attention seems to have been in a great measure withdrawn from the bill under consideration. Let us remember, however, that whatever may be our respective opinions on the subject of the powers of the several branches of Government, the passage of this bill may in the present state of things become absolutely necessary; let us reflect, that upon our decision on this occasion, the execution of the treaty on our part in the spirit of good faith, may essentially depend, and whilst we look to the question of Constitutional power, let us not entirely forget the peculiar character of this treaty, and the provisions of this bill.

Before I call the attention of the House to the treaty itself, and endeavor to explain the necessity of legislative interference on this occasion, let me touch for a moment on the subject of the treaty-making power; without pretending, however, to a comprehensive investigation of the Constitutional doctrines in relation to it, as such an attempt would lead to too wide a discussion, and might prove both tedious and uninteresting.

I concede, without hesitation, that the treaty-making power is vested in the President and Senate; but, so far from assenting to the proposition that Congress have in no case a right to interfere, I contend that it may be of the very essence of a treaty to engage on the part of the United States that Congress will, or will not do an act, or will, or will not, pass a law.

I understand a treaty made by the Executive to be an engagement entered into by the President and Senate on the part of the United States, with a foreign Power, by which something may be engaged to be done or omitted on the part of this nation. It is rather a contract by which the parties undertake that something shall be done, than an act by which it is done. The stipulations of the instrument which the nation by its Executive undertakes to perform, are also of various characters, and separate and distinct natures. Some may be Executive merely, some Legislative; and indeed, from the treaty made under the old Confederation whereby it was stipulated that the creditors of the two nations should meet with no impediment in the recovery of their debts, it seems, that the engagements of the contracting Powers may on some occasions be referable to the Judiciary department of the Government. In either case, the treaty entered into by the President and Senate, can be regarded in no other light than as an engagement on the part of this nation, that the stipulations of the contract shall be carried into effect by that department of the Government within whose province they may respectively fall. Thus, if it be agreed, that an Executive act shall be done, the Executive alone may carry the treaty into full and complete operation. If it be agreed that something shall be done, which falls within the province of the legislative power, then the legislative aid become necessary, because, though the President and Senate may make a treaty, the Constitution nowhere empowers them to make a law. These principles are not only clear and palpable, I conceive, but they have been acted on, and are admitted in effect by the course of argument which has been pursued. Thus, if it be engaged that peace shall be made and armies withdrawn, the Executive, by its mandate, proclaims peace, or commands the retreat of its forces; yet, however solemn and obligatory a treaty from the moment of its signature becomes upon that department on which it binds, until that department acts, it is no rule of action for those under its control. If a treaty of peace for example be made, yet if the Executive fail to promulgate it, if they refuse to proclaim it, if they refuse to give orders to their armies, and their commanders to suspend hostilities, no commander, no officer would be justified in acting under it until his orders were received, unless he did so upon his own responsibility. So too in the case of the treaty under consideration. However conclusive and plain the treaty may be, who will pretend that every collector and deputy collector in the Union may, without orders from any department of the Government, consider the treaty as the supreme law, as his supreme rule of conduct, and act accordingly? If not, then some other act is necessary to carry this treaty into operation, whether Executive or Legislative, I will not now stop to inquire. The treaty, then, does not execute itself. It it not (without anything further) the supreme law or rule of conduct for every individual, for, if it be, then every individual is justified in acting at once without waiting Executive instruction; nay, after receiving such instruction, they would in conscience be bound to follow the treaty (thus become the law of the land) rather than the instruction of the President and his Secretaries.

These considerations prove, sufficiently, I conceive, that even where stipulations are made which are fully within the province of the Executive power, a treaty does not, cannot, execute itself; that it is in truth a contract to do something, not an act by which it is done.

This distinction, Mr. Speaker, becomes yet more plain, when we come to apply it to a treaty containing stipulations by which the nation engages to do something that falls within the sphere of legislative power. I will not stop to prove, by laborious reasoning, that cases may occur in which the legislative body must be called on to execute the provisions of a treaty; I will not fatigue the House with an effort to show that there are cases in which the treaty can neither operate as a law, nor the Executive enforce its provisions without a law. It would be useless, for the position has always been admitted, has often been acted on, and is now most amply conceded. Such, sir, is the case of a treaty; the stipulations of which, calling upon the treasures of the country, require an appropriation. Such, too, the case of a cession of territory spoken of in the debate, if we could dream of such a power existing anywhere in the Federal Government. Such, too, the case of the stipulations in the convention by which Louisiana was ceded to the United States, whereby on certain terms she was to be admitted into the Union. Let us pause for a moment and ask ourselves, whether such treaties can be regarded as executing themselves; whether they can have operation without legislative aid? Can a treaty lay a tax; can a treaty make an appropriation; can a treaty, ipso facto, cede territory; can a treaty erect a Territory into a State? Can these things be done by the treaty alone, or by the aid and instrumentality of the Executive without Legislative assistance? It is admitted on all hands they cannot. Even the most zealous supporters of the treaty-making power acknowledge, that they must in such cases look to the Legislature, though they contend that this body is bound to pass the necessary laws. I will not stop at this time to examine this principle, but ask, whether it is not palpable from these admissions, that in all such cases a treaty does not actually make or change the law, but only engages on the part of the United States that it shall be made or changed? If so, I am not incorrect in supposing, that a treaty is merely an engagement that certain acts shall be done by that department of the Government within whose province they may fall; and that it does not operate in cases falling within the sphere of the Legislative power, without the aid of that branch of the Government.

If it were otherwise, if we were indeed to give into the monstrous construction, that a treaty of itself is to be regarded a law; that it can repeal a solemn act of the Legislature, and operate directly upon the community without the agency of that branch of the Government, in cases exclusively within the legitimate sphere; to what fatal lengths shall we not be led. If treaties have this effect in one case, why not in all? If in taking off a duty, why not in making an appropriation; if in repealing one law, why not in passing another; why not in laying taxes, granting subsidies, making cessions of territory, and even paying tribute to an Algerine Dey without consent of Congress, if indeed our gallant seamen had not procured more honorable terms for us in the late negotiation? Can gentlemen draw the line of discrimination? Can they point out that part of the Constitution, which, in the supposed concession to the treaty-making power of the legislative authority, says to the former, "thus far shall thou go and no farther?" And if they cannot, this independence of the Legislature must exist in all cases or none. It is admitted that it does not exist in all (as in the cases of appropriation, &c.) and I therefore conclude it exists in none.

But if the legislative authority be necessary, is it true that we are bound to act in a particular way? Is it true that we must pass the laws which the treaty-making power engages we shall pass? Impossible! When our aid is called for, we must have the power to deliberate; if to deliberate, we must have a discretion to pass or to reject; since without it deliberation is a mockery and legislative solemnities a fair subject of derision and contempt.

There is another point of view, Mr. Speaker, in which I would present this subject to the House.

To whom has the Constitutional charter given the legislative power? I answer, in the explicit language of the instrument in its commencing clause, "to a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate, and House of Representatives." Is this ample grant restricted by any subsequent part of the instrument? We are referred by gentlemen to the treaty-making power, and to the clause which, as they contend, declares that "treaties shall be made the supreme law of the land." If indeed by any fair construction this clause can be deemed to declare that treaties shall be superior to the laws, then our adversaries may claim the victory; otherwise they must yield it. But does it so? It declares the Constitution and the laws of Congress, and the treaties, to be the supreme law.—Superior to what? To the laws of the States; as we perceive by the conclusion; "anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding." It declares all three to be supreme; it does not attempt to graduate the respective authority of each, nor can it be predicated of either, that under this clause it is superior to the others. Even the Constitution itself would have no claims to superiority, if it looked only to this passage for its title to supremacy.

If then the legislative power be vested in Congress, and if by this clause it be not taken away or subject to the control of the treaty-making power, I presume it remains unimpaired in the representatives of the nation. If so, their concurrence is not only essential to carry into effect a treaty touching upon legislative powers, but, in acting upon it, they must deliberate with the freedom of independent legislators.

It is contended, however, by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) that a treaty is superior to the law, because it is a contract between our nation and another Power. I am ready to admit, Mr. Speaker, the ingenuity of the gentleman in drawing this distinction. It is what may well be expected from his ingenious and active mind. But I think it will appear that it is more ingenious than solid, more true than applicable to the subject.

I admit that where a contract has been entered into and completed by all the necessary powers under our Constitution, it is binding upon the nation. But the question still recurs, when is it complete? In the case of a treaty containing stipulations merely Executive, it is complete when the ratifications are exchanged. In the case of a treaty which requires a legislative act to give it operation, we contend that the legislative sanction must be given before it is complete. Until then it is not a binding contract, and the rights of the third party (the foreign Power) do not exist. Is it not the petitio principii, or (if the gentleman will permit me to use the vulgar translation) is it not begging the question to contend, that before the legislative sanction the contract is binding, when the very question between us is, whether that sanction be necessary to make it binding?

Let it not be said that foreign nations know nothing of these Constitutional niceties. My friend from South Carolina (Mr. LOWMEYER) has already given the proper answer to such a suggestion. The foreign Power which contracts with us is bound to look to the Constitutional charter to see that they contract with the proper authority. Suppose the treaty were ratified by the President without the assent of the Senate. Could the foreign Power complain of broken faith because we should refuse to abide by it? Could it allege that it knew nothing of the Senatorial ratification; that it was not versed in the mysteries of our Constitution? By no means. If a foreign Power contracts without looking to the authority and Constitutional extent of powers of those who undertake to treat with them, the loss be upon them—we are not to be the sufferers. So, if, as we contend, all treaties involving legislative power require legislative sanction, foreign Powers must look to it; and seeing that the Executive are not omnipotent, and have no power to bind us absolutely in such cases, they must act accordingly.

Let us, in testing the correctness of the principle contended for on the other side of the House, examine, moreover, whether it does not lead to inevitable inconsistency. It is asserted that a treaty is superior to a law in conflict with its provisions, and repeals a prior legislative act which is at variance with its stipulations. Here then the treaty-making power is superior to the law. Yet it is admitted that Congress can declare war, a prior treaty to the contrary notwithstanding, and by the act of war annul and abrogate a treaty. Here then the law is superior to the treaty-making power. Can it at the same time be both superior and inferior? Can it be true that whilst the President and Senate can repeal pre-existing laws, the same power which made those pre-existing laws, can in its turn become superior, and abrogate the act of the President and Senate? Impossible! it is an inconsistency that cannot be admitted; it is a construction that would beget unutterable confusion.

But it is said by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) that the act of declaring war is rather a judicial than a legislative act. I understand the gentleman's idea and admit the ingenuity of the distinction, though it cannot avail him in answer to the difficulty I have suggested. I suppose the gentleman to mean, that in passing an act declaring war, the Congress of the United States express their opinion or judgment on the state of the relations between this country and its adversary, pronouncing that in their judgment subsisting treaties are broken, and that such an act is not to be regarded as mere ordinary legislation in which the interest and advantage of the nation are the chief objects in view. Should we admit this subtle distinction, does it avoid the difficulty? Is not the Congress if possessed of the power of declaring war, whatever be the nature of the act, superior to the treaty-making power whose contracts it thereby abrogates? And does not the question still recur, whether it can be both superior and inferior—whether the legislative and the treaty-making power can reciprocally and ad infinitum repeal the acts of each other?

Such, Mr. Speaker, are some of the considerations on the subject of the treaty-making power which have presented themselves to my mind; and though it would not be difficult to take a much more excursive range on this interesting subject, yet I shall leave to others to do so, and proceed to the second inquiry I proposed to myself—Does the treaty under consideration require legislative aid to effect its provisions? If it does, gentlemen on all sides of the House should concur in voting for the bill. We should do so, because we all believe it advisable to carry the treaty into effect; those on the other side should do so peculiarly, because, according to their doctrines, they are morally bound to legislate where the treaty requires legislative aid. All should be solicitous to avoid the slightest imputation on the faith of the nation.

If ever there was a treaty in which legislative aid was necessary, this appears to me peculiarly to require it. Its stipulations not only comprehend subjects within the sphere of the legislative power, but those subjects of legislation which are more peculiarly the province of this branch of the Government. Whether we consider the question in relation to the peculiar powers of this House in relation to taxation, to the pledge of the duties in question to the public creditors, or the particular provisions of the instrument, I can perceive no Constitutional means of carrying the convention into effect without legislative co-operation.

Is there, I will ask, any subject of legislation, Mr. Speaker, in which this House has greater interest or greater Constitutional control than that which is in anywise connected with taxation and revenue? Can gentlemen point out anything more important, and more interwoven with all our feelings than the question, "on what articles shall taxes be laid; from what subjects shall the necessary revenues of the Government be raised?" What has produced in this House more sensation than whether the revenues shall be raised from whiskey, from salt, from merchandise, or land? The objects of taxation are equally important and interesting with the quantum to be raised, or the appropriation of it after it has been raised; and if gentlemen admit that an appropriation by this House is necessary to effectuate the provisions of a treaty, which engages that such an appropriation shall be made, they must equally concede the necessity of a legislative act, where the treaty affects the mode in which the public burdens shall be imposed. And what is the present case? The treaty engages that a part of our revenues, which were heretofore raised from taxes and duties on British ships, shall be taken from them, and of course shall be raised from other objects. As we must raise the amount, and can no longer derive it from British vessels, we must draw it from still taxes, or land taxes, or from some other source which might be equally disagreeable; and thus, although this House has a peculiar control over such subjects, the President and Senate, under the construction given to the Constitution by some gentlemen in this debate, would be vested by that instrument with the monstrous power of directing this body in what manner taxes shall be laid. This cannot be true—this cannot be the fair interpretation of the instrument. A law in this case is, therefore, peculiarly necessary to remove those duties which the legislative body alone can impose, and alone can abrogate.

The necessity of legislative interference on the present occasion is yet more palpable, when we turn our attention to the public creditors. The very duties in question are pledged to them for the payment of their claims, and the nation has solemnly pledged its faith that they shall continue until the debt is paid off, reserving, however, to Congress (not to the President and Senate) the right to substitute others in their stead. Shall this power, reserved by the act to Congress, composed of all the branches of the Legislature, be exercised then by the President and Senate alone? Shall they have the authority, without our acquiescence and the powers reserved to us, to sweep away the mortgaged subject, and break the plighted faith of the nation with the public creditor? Will the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) he who has so strenuously contended for the inviolability of contracts—will he assume such a position? I am sure he will not. But if the President and Senate have the powers reserved to Congress, of taking off those duties at their discretion, have they also the power of making the substitute, and of laying the taxes which are to supply their place? If they have, then is the Constitutional power of this House gone forever; if they have not, then have they the power of breaking the plighted faith of the nation, and annulling the mortgage we have given to our creditors? Either alternative is so pregnant with mischief, that we must renounce the construction which leads to it, and acknowledge the necessity of the agency of Congress, under the provisions of the law I have quoted, to abolish duties which have been solemnly pledged to their creditors.

When we look to the provisions of the convention itself we cannot doubt, I conceive, of the necessity of the bill before you. What does the convention provide? That the duties on American and British bottoms, which are now unequal, shall be equalized. And can this equality only be effected in one mode—by taking off the additional ten per cent. on British ships? Cannot an equalization be equally effected by raising the duties on American ships to the present duties on British vessels? And have we not even the poor privilege of deciding which of the alternatives shall be adopted? Does the treaty-making power draw to it this power also? Because the President and Senate have bound the nation to effect an object in one of two ways, have they also the power of declaring which of the two shall be adopted, to the exclusion of the legislative power of this House? Impossible. If we have not the right now, we never can have it hereafter; and, according to this idea, Congress can never lay any additional duties on tonnage, however equal in their operation, because a paramount power (the President and Senate) have declared that, under this treaty, the extra duties shall be taken off.

I conclude, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that, for the reasons I have offered, our aid as a legislative body is necessary on the present occasion, and that the bill before the House should be passed. I am ready to give that aid, and to vote for the passage of the bill, because I believe it will be advantageous to the nation, and because I apprehend that, without such an act, the treaty must either remain unexecuted, or the Executive must assume to itself powers which are not within its province.

Mr. PINKNEY said he intended yesterday, if the state of his health had permitted, to have trespass on the House with a short sketch of the grounds upon which he disapproved of this bill. What I could not do then, said he, I am about to endeavor now, under the pressure nevertheless of continuing indisposition, as well as under the influence of a natural reluctance thus to manifest an apparently ambitious and improvident hurry to lay aside the character of a listener to the wisdom of others, by which I could not fail to profit, for that of an expounder of my own humble notions, which are not likely to be profitable to anybody. It is indeed but too probable that I should best have consulted both delicacy and discretion if I had forborne this precipitate attempt to launch my little bark upon what an honorable member has aptly termed "the torrent of debate" which this bill has produced. I am conscious that it may with singular propriety be said of me that I am novus hospes here, that I have scarcely begun to acquire a domicile among those whom I am undertaking to address; and that recently transplanted hither from courts of judicature, I ought for a season to look upon myself as a sort of exotic, which time has not sufficiently familiarized with the soil to which it has been removed, to enable it to put forth either fruit or flower. However all this may be, it is now too late to be silent. I proceed, therefore, to entreat your indulgent attention to the few words with which I have to trouble you upon the subject under deliberation.

That subject has already been treated with an admirable force and perspicuity on all sides of the House. The strong power of argument has drawn aside, as it ought to do, the veil which is supposed to belong to it, and which some of us seem unwilling to disturb; and the stronger power of genius, from a higher region than that of argument, has thrown upon it all the light with which it is the prerogative of genius to invest and illustrate everything. It is fit that it should be so; for the subject is worthy, by its dignity and importance, to employ in the discussion of it all the powers of the mind and all the eloquence by which I have already felt that this assembly is distinguished. The subject is the fundamental law. We owe it to the people to labor with sincerity and diligence, to ascertain the true construction of that law, which is but a record of their will. We owe it to the obligations of the oath which has recently been imprinted upon our consciences, as well as to the people, to be obedient to that will, when we have succeeded in ascertaining it. I shall give you my opinion upon this matter, with the utmost deference for the judgment of others; but at the same time with that honest and unreserved freedom which becomes this place, and is suited to my habits.

Commerce with Great Britain.

Before we can be in a situation to decide whether this bill ought to pass, we must know precisely what it is; what it is not is obvious. It is not a bill which is auxiliary to the treaty. It does not deal with details, which the treaty does not bear in its own bosom. It contains no subsidiary enactments, no dependent provisions, flowing as corollaries from the treaty. It is not to raise money, or to make appropriations, or to do anything else beyond or out of the treaty. It acts simply as the echo of the treaty.

"Ingeminat voces, auditaque verba reportat." It may properly be called the twin brother of the treaty; its duplicate, its reflected image; for it re-enacts with a timid fidelity, somewhat inconsistent with the boldness of its pretensions, all that the treaty stipulates, and having performed that work of supererogation, stops. It once attempted something more, indeed, but that surplus has been expunged from it as a desperate intruder, as something which might violate, by a misinterpretation of the treaty, that very public faith which we are now prepared to say the treaty has never plighted in any the smallest degree. In a word, the bill is a fac simile of the treaty in all its clauses.

I am warranted in concluding, then, that if it be anything but an empty form of words, it is a confirmation or ratification of the treaty; or, to speak with a more guarded accuracy, is an act to which only (if passed into a law) the treaty can owe its being. If it does not spring from the "pruritus leges ferendi," by which this body can never be afflicted, I am warranted in saying that it springs from an hypothesis (which may afflict us with a worse disease) that no treaty of commerce can be made by any power in the State but Congress. It stands upon that postulate, or it is a mere bubble, which might be suffered to float through the forms of legislation, and then to burst without consequence or notice.

That this postulate is utterly irreconcilable with the claims and port with which this convention comes before you, it is impossible to deny. Look at it! Has it the air or shape of a mere pledge that the President will recommend to Congress the passage of such laws as will produce the effect at which it aims? Does it profess to be preliminary, or provisional, or inchoate, or to rely upon your instrumentality in the consummation of it, or to take any notice of you, however distant, as actual or eventual parties to it? No; it pretends upon the face of it, and in the solemnities with which it has been accompanied and followed, to be a pact with a foreign State, complete and self-efficient, from the obligation of which this Government cannot now escape, and to the perfection of which no more is necessary than has already been done. It contains the clause which is found in the treaty of 1794, and substantially in every other treaty made by the United States under the present Constitution, so as to have become a formula, that when ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and by His Britannic Majesty, and the respective ratifications mutually exchanged, it shall be binding and obligatory on the said States and His Majesty.

It has been ratified in conformity with that clause. Its ratifications have been exchanged in the established and stipulated mode. It has been proclaimed as other treaties have been proclaimed, by the Executive Government, as an integral portion of the law of the land, and our citizens at home and abroad have been admonished to keep and observe it accordingly. It has been sent to the other contracting party, with the last stamp of the national faith upon it, after the manner of former treaties with the same Power, and will have been received and acted upon by that party as a concluded contract, long before your loitering legislation can overtake it. I profess, sir, I am somewhat at a loss to understand what this convention has been since its ratifications were exchanged, and what it is now, if our bill be sound in its principle. Has it not been, and is it not, an unintelligible, unbaptized and unbaptizable thing, without attributes of any kind, bearing the semblance of an executed compact, but in reality a hollow fiction; a thing which no man is held to consider even as the germ of a treaty, entitled to be cherished in the vineyard of the Constitution; a thing which professing to have done everything that public honor demands, has done nothing but practise delusion? You may ransack every diplomatic nomenclature, and run through every vocabulary, whether of diplomacy or law, and you shall not find a word by which you may distinguish, if our bill be correct in its hypothesis, this "deed without a name." A plain man who is not used to manage his phrases, may, therefore, presume to say that if this convention with England be not a valid treaty, which does not stand in need of your assistance, it is an usurpation on the part of those who have undertaken to make it; that if it be not an act within the treaty-making capacity, confided to the President and Senate, it is an encroachment on the legislative rights of Congress.

I am one of those who view the bill upon the table as declaring that it is not within that capacity, as looking down upon the convention as the still-born progeny of arrogated power, as offering to it the paternity of Congress, and affecting by that paternity to give to it life and strength; and as I think that the convention does not stand in need of any such filiation, to make it either strong or legitimate, that it is already all that it can become, and that useless legislation upon such a subject is vicious legislation, I shall vote against the bill. The correctness of these opinions is what I propose to establish.

I lay it down as an incontrovertible truth, that the Constitution has assumed (and, indeed, how could it do otherwise?) that the Government of the United States might and would have occasion, like the other Governments of the civilized world, to enter into treaties with foreign Powers, upon the various subjects involved in their mutual relations; and further, that it might be, and was, proper, to designate the department of the Government in which the capacity to make such treaties should be lodged. It has said, accordingly, that the President, with the concurrence of the Senate, shall possess this portion of the national sovereignty. It has, furthermore, given to the same Magistrate, with the same concurrence, the exclusive creation and control of the whole machinery of diplomacy. He only, with the approbation of the Senate, can appoint a negotiator, or can make any step towards negotiation. The Constitution does not, in any part of it, even intimate that any other department shall possess either a constant or an occasional right to interpose in the preparation of any treaty, or in the final perfection of it. The President and Senate are explicitly pointed out as the sole actors in that sort of transaction. The prescribed concurrence of the Senate, and that, too, by a majority greater than the ordinary legislative majority, plainly excludes the necessity of Congressional concurrence. If the consent of Congress to any treaty had been intended, the Constitution would not have been guilty of the absurdity of first putting a treaty for ratification to the President and Senate exclusively, and again, to the same President and Senate as portions of the Legislature. It would have submitted the whole matter at once to Congress, and the more especially, as the ratification of a treaty by the Senate, as a branch of the Legislature, may be by a smaller number than a ratification of it by the same body, as a branch of the Executive government. If the ratification of any treaty by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, must be followed by a legislative ratification, it is a mere nonentity. It is good for all purposes, or for none. And if it be nothing in effect, it is a mockery by which nobody would be bound. The President and Senate would not themselves be bound by it; and the ratification would at last depend, not upon the will of the President and two-thirds of the Senate, but upon the will of a bare majority of the two branches of the Legislature, subject to the qualified legislative control of the President.

Upon the power of the President and Senate, therefore, there can be no doubt. The only question is, as to the extent of it, or, in other words, as to the subject upon which it may be exerted. The effect of the power, when exerted within its lawful sphere, is beyond the reach of controversy. The Constitution has declared, that whatsoever amounts to a treaty, made under the authority of the United States, shall immediately be supreme law. It has contradistinguished a treaty as a law, from an act of Congress as a law. It has erected treaties, so contradistinguished, into a binding judicial rule. It has given them to our courts of justice, in defining their jurisdiction, as a portion of the lex terræ, which they are to interpret and enforce. In a word, it has communicated to them, if ratified by the department which it has specially provided for the making of them, the rank of law, or it has spoken without meaning. And if it has elevated them to that rank, it is idle to attempt to raise them to it by ordinary legislation.

Upon the extent of the power, or the subjects upon which it may act, there is as little room for controversy. The power is to make treaties. The word treaties is nomen generalissimum, and will comprehend commercial treaties, unless there be a limit upon it by which they are excluded. It is the appellative, which will take in the whole species, if there be nothing to narrow its scope. There is no such limit. There is not a syllable in the context of the clause to restrict the natural import of its phraseology. The power is left to the force of the generic term, and is therefore as wide as a treaty-making power can be. It embraces all the varieties which it could be supposed this Government could find it necessary or proper to make, or it embraces none. It covers the whole treaty-making ground which this Government could be expected to occupy, or not an inch of it.

It is a just presumption, that it was designed to be coextensive with all the exigencies of our affairs. Usage sanctions that presumption—expediency does the same. The omission of any exception to the power, the omission of the designation of a mode, by which a treaty, not intended to be included within it, might otherwise be made, confirms it. That a commercial treaty was, above all others, in the contemplation of the Constitution, is manifest. The immemorial practice of Europe, and particularly of the nation from which we emigrated, the consonance of enlightened theory to that practice, prove it. It may be said, indeed, that at the epoch of the birth of our Constitution, the necessity for a power to make commercial treaties was scarcely visible, for that our trade was then in its infancy. It was so; but it was the infancy of another Hercules, promising, not, indeed, a victory over the lion of Nemæa, or the boar of Erymanthus, but the peaceful conquest of every sea which could be subjected to the dominion of commercial enterprise. It was then as apparent as it is now, that the destinies of this great nation were irrevocably commercial; that the ocean would be whitened by our sails; and the "ultima thule" of the world compelled to witness the more than Phœnician spirit and intelligence of our merchants. With this glorious anticipation dawning upon them; with this resplendent Aurora gilding the prospect of the future; nay, with the risen orb of trade illuminating the vast horizon of American greatness, it cannot be supposed that the framers of the Constitution did not look to the time when we should be called upon to make commercial conventions.

It needs not the aid of the imagination to reject this disparaging and monstrous supposition. Dullness itself, throwing aside the lethargy of its character, and rising for a passing moment to the rapture of enthusiasm, will disclaim it with indignation.

It is said, however, that the Constitution has given to Congress the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and that, since it would be inconsistent with that power, that the President, with the consent of the Senate, should do the same thing, it follows that this power of Congress is an exception out of the treaty-making power. Never were premises, as it appears to my understanding, less suited to the conclusion. The power of Congress to regulate our foreign trade, is a power of municipal legislation, and was designed to operate as far, as upon such a subject, municipal legislation can reach. Without such a power, the Government would be wholly inadequate to the ends for which it was instituted. A power to regulate commerce by treaty alone would touch only a portion of the subject. A wider and more general power was therefore indispensable, and it was properly devolved upon Congress, as the Legislature of the Union.

On the other hand, a power of mere municipal legislation, acting upon views exclusively our own, having no reference to a reciprocation of advantages by arrangements with a foreign State, would also fall short of the ends of Government in a country, of which the commercial relations are complex and extensive, and liable to be embarrassed by conflicts between its own interests and those of other nations. That the power of Congress is simply legislative in the strictest sense, and calculated for ordinary domestic regulations only, is plain from the language in which it is communicated. There is nothing in that language which indicates regulation, by compact or compromise, nothing which points to the co-operation of a foreign Power, nothing which designates a treaty-making faculty. It is not connected with any of the necessary accompaniments of that faculty, it is not furnished with any of those means, without which it is impossible to make the smallest progress towards a treaty.

It is self-evident that a capacity to regulate commerce by treaty was intended by the Constitution to be lodged somewhere. It is just as evident that the legislative capacity of Congress does not amount to it, and cannot be exerted to produce a treaty. It can produce only a statute, with which a foreign State cannot be made to concur, and which will not yield to any modifications which a foreign State may desire to impress upon it for suitable equivalents. There is no way in which Congress, as such, can mould its laws into treaties, if it respects the Constitution. It may legislate and counter-legislate; but it must forever be beyond its capacity to combine in a law, emanating from its separate domestic authority, its own views with those of other Governments, and to produce a harmonious reconciliation of those jarring purposes and discordant elements, which it is the business of negotiation to adjust.

I reason thus, then, upon this part of the subject. It is clear that the power of Congress, as to foreign commerce, is only what it professes to be in the Constitution, a legislative power, to be exerted municipally without consultation or agreement with those with whom we have an intercourse of trade; it is undeniable that the Constitution meant to provide for the exercise of another power relative to commerce, which should exert itself in concert with the analogous power in other countries, and should bring about its results, not by statute enacted by itself, but by an international compact called a treaty; that it is manifest that this other power is vested by the Constitution in the President and Senate, the only department of the Government which it authorizes to make any treaty, and which it enables to make all treaties; that if it be so vested, its regular exercise must result in that which, as far as it reaches, is law in itself, and consequently repeals such municipal regulations as stand in its way, since it is expressly declared by the Constitution that treaties regularly made shall have, as they ought to have, the force of law. In all this I perceive nothing to perplex or alarm us. It exhibits a well-digested and uniform plan of Government, worthy of the excellent men by whom it was formed. The ordinary power to regulate commerce by statutory enactments could only be devolved upon Congress, possessing all the other legislative powers of the Government. The extraordinary power to regulate it by treaty could not be devolved upon Congress, because, from its composition and the absence of all those authorities and functions which are essential to the activity and effect of a treaty-making power, it was not calculated to be the depository of it. It was wise and consistent to place the extraordinary power to regulate commerce by treaty, where the residue of the treaty-making power was placed, where only the means of negotiation could be found, and the skilful and beneficial use of them could reasonably be expected. That Congress legislates upon commerce subject to the treaty-making power, is a position perfectly intelligible; but the understanding is in some degree confounded by the other proposition, that the legislative power of Congress is an exception out of the treaty-making power. It introduces into the Constitution a strange anomaly—a commercial State, with a written Constitution and no power in it to regulate its trade, in conjunction with other States, in the universal mode of convention.

It will be in vain to urge that this anomaly is merely imaginary, for that the President and Senate may make a treaty of commerce for the consideration of Congress. The answer is, that the treaties which the President and Senate are entitled to make, are such as, when made, become law; that it is no part of their functions simply to initiate treaties, but conclusively to make them; and that where they have no power to make them, there is no provision in the Constitution how or by whom they shall be made.

That there is nothing new in the idea of a separation of the legislative and conventional powers upon commercial subjects, and of the necessary control of the former by the latter, is known to all who are acquainted with the constitution of England. The Parliament of that country enacts the statutes by which its trade is regulated municipally. The Crown modifies them by a treaty. It has been imagined, indeed, that the Parliament is in the practice of confirming such treaties; but the fact is undoubtedly otherwise. Commercial treaties are laid before Parliament because the King's Ministers are responsible for their advice in the making of them, and because the vast range and complication of the English laws of trade and revenue render legislation unavoidable, not for the ratification, but the execution of their commercial treaties.

It is suggested, again, that the treaty-making power (unless we are tenants in common of it with the President and Senate, to the extent at least of our legislative rights) is a pestilent monster, pregnant with all sorts of disasters! It teems with "gorgons, and hydras, and chimeras dire!" At any rate I may take for granted that the case before us does not justify this array of metaphor and fable, since we are all agreed that the convention with England is not only harmless, but salutary. To put this particular case, however, out of the argument, what have we to do with considerations like these? Are we here to form or to submit to the Constitution, as it has been given to us for a rule by those who are our masters? Can we take upon ourselves the office of political casuists, and, because we think that a power ought to be less than it is, compel it to shrink to our standard? Are we to bow with reverence before the national will as the Constitution displays it, or to fashion it to our own; to quarrel with that charter, without which we ourselves are nothing, or to take it as a guide which we cannot desert with innocence or safety? But why is the treaty-making power, lodged, as I contend it is, in the President and Senate, likely to disaster us, as we are required to apprehend it will? Sufficient checks have not, as it seems, been provided, either by the Constitution or the nature of things, to prevent the abuse of it. It is in the House of Representatives alone that the amulet which bids defiance to the approaches of political disease, or cures it when it has commenced, can in all vicissitudes be found. I hold that the checks are sufficient, without the charm of our legislative agency, for all these occasions which wisdom is bound to foresee and to guard against; and that, as to the rest, (the eccentricities and portents which no ordinary checks can deal with,) the occasions must provide for themselves.

It is natural, here, to ask of gentlemen, what security they would have? They cannot take a bond of fate, and they have every pledge which is short of it. Have they not, as respects the President, all the security upon which they rely from day to day for the discreet and upright discharge of the whole of his other duties, many and various as they are? What security have they that he will not appoint to office the refuse of the world; that he will not pollute the sanctuary of justice by calling vagabonds to its holy ministry, instead of adorning it with men like those who now give to the bench more dignity than they receive from it; that he will not enter into a treaty of amnesty with every conspirator against law and order, and pardon culprits from mere enmity to virtue? The security for all this, and infinitely more, is found in the Constitution and in the order of nature; and we are all satisfied with it. One should think that the same security, which thus far time has so discredited, might be sufficient to tranquillize us upon the score of the power which we are now considering.

We talk of ourselves as if we only were the Representatives of the people. But the First Magistrate of this country is also the representative of the people, the creature of their sovereignty, the administrator of their power, their steward and servant, as you are. He comes from the people—is lifted by them into place and authority—and after a short time returns to them for censure or applause. There is no analogy between such a magistrate and the hereditary monarchs of Europe. He is not born to the inheritance of office; he cannot even be elected until he has reached an age at which he must pass for what he is—until his habits have been formed, his integrity tried, his capacity ascertained, his character discussed and probed for a series of years by a press which knows none of the restraints of European policy. He acts, as you do, in the full view of his constituents, and under the consciousness that, on account of the singleness of his station, all eyes are upon him. He knows too, as well as you can know, the temper and intelligence of those for whom he acts, and to whom he is amenable. He cannot hope that they will be blind to the vices of his administration, on subjects of high concernment and vital interest; and, in proportion as he acts upon his own responsibility, unrelieved and undiluted by the infusion of ours, is the danger of ill-advised conduct likely to be present to his mind.

Of all the powers which have been intrusted to him, there is none to which the temptations to abuse belong so little as to the treaty-making power, in all its branches—none which can boast such mighty safeguards in the feelings and views and passions which even a misanthrope could attribute to the foremost citizen of this Republic. He can have no motive to paralyze by a commercial or any other treaty the prosperity of his country. Setting apart the restraints of honor and patriotism, which are characteristic of public men in a nation habitually free, could he do so without subjecting himself as a member of the community—to say nothing of his immediate connexions—to the evils of his own work? A commercial treaty, too, is always a conspicuous measure; it speaks for itself; it cannot take the garb of hypocrisy, and shelter itself from the scrutiny of a vigilant and well-instructed population. If it be bad, it will be condemned; and if dishonestly made, be execrated. The pride of country, moreover, which animates even the lowest of mankind, is here a peculiar pledge for the provident and wholesome exercise of power. There is not a consideration by which a chord in the human breast can be made to vibrate that is not in this case the ally of duty. Every hope, either lofty or humble, that springs forward to the future; even the vanity which looks not beyond the moment; the dread of shame and the love of glory; the instinct of ambition; the domestic affections; the cold pondering of prudence; and the ardent instigations of sentiment and passion,—are all on the side of duty. It is in the exercise of this power, that responsibility to public opinion, which even Despotism feels and truckles to, is of gigantic force. If it were possible—as I am sure it is not—that an American citizen, raised upon the credit of a long life of virtue to a station so full of honor, could feel a disposition to mingle the little interests of a perverted ambition with the great concerns of his country, as embraced by a commercial treaty, and to sacrifice her happiness and power by the stipulations of that treaty, to flatter or aggrandize a foreign State, he would still be saved from the perdition of such a course, not only by Constitutional checks, but by the irresistible efficacy of responsibility to public opinion, in a nation whose public opinion wears no mask, and will not be silenced. He would remember that his political career is but the thing of an hour, and that, when it has passed, he must descend to the private station from which he rose, the object either of love and veneration, or of scorn and horror. If we cast a glance at England, we shall not fail to see the influence of public opinion upon an hereditary King, an hereditary nobility, and a House of Commons, elected in a great degree by rotten boroughs, and overflowing with placemen. And if this influence is potent there against all the efforts of independent power and widespread corruption, it must in this country be omnipotent.

But, the treaty-making power of the President is further checked by the necessity of the concurrence of two-thirds of the Senate, consisting of men selected by the Legislatures of the States, themselves elected by the people. They too must have passed through the probation of time before they can be chosen, and must bring with them every title to confidence. The duration of their office is that of a few years; their numbers are considerable; their Constitutional responsibility as great as it can be; and their moral responsibility beyond all calculation.

The power of impeachment has been mentioned as a check upon the President, in the exercise of the treaty-making capacity. I rely upon it less than upon others of, as I think, a better class; but, as the Constitution places some reliance upon it, so do I. It has been said, that impeachment has been tried and found wanting. Two impeachments have failed, as I have understood, (that of a Judge was one,) but they may have failed for reasons consistent with the general efficacy of such a proceeding. I know nothing of their merits, but I am justified in supposing that the evidence was defective, or that the parties were innocent, as they were pronounced to be. Of this, however, I feel assured, that if it should ever happen that the President is found to deserve the punishment which impeachment seeks to inflict—even for making a treaty to which his judges have become parties—and this body should accuse him in a Constitutional way, he will not easily escape. But, be that as it may, I ask if it is nothing that you have power to arraign him as a culprit? Is it nothing that you can bring him to the bar, expose his misconduct to the world, and bring down the indignation of the public upon him, and those who dare to acquit him?

If there be any power explicitly granted by the Constitution to Congress, it is that of declaring war; and if there be any exercise of human legislation more solemn and important than another, it is a declaration of war. For expansion it is the largest; for effect the most awful of all the enactments to which Congress is competent; and it always is, or ought to be, preceded by grave and anxious deliberation. This power, too, is connected with, or virtually involves, others of high import and efficacy; among which may be ranked the power of granting letters of marque and reprisal, of regulating captures, of prohibiting intercourse with, or the acceptance of protections or licenses from, the enemy. Yet farther: a power to declare war implies, with peculiar emphasis, a negative upon all power, in any other branch of the Government, inconsistent with the full and continuing effect of it. A power to make peace in any other branch of the Government is utterly inconsistent with that full and continuing effect. It may even prevent it from having any effect at all, since peace may follow almost immediately (although it rarely does so follow) the commencement of a war. If, therefore, it be undeniable that the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, has power to make a treaty of peace available ipso jure, it is undeniable that he has power to repeal, by the mere operation of such a treaty, the highest acts of Congressional legislation. And it will not be questioned that this repealing power is, from the eminent nature of the war-declaring power, less fit to be made out by inference than the power of modifying by treaty the laws which regulate our foreign trade. Now, the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, has an incontestable and uncontested right to make a treaty of peace of absolute inherent efficacy, and that, too, in virtue of the very same general provision in the Constitution which the refinements of political speculation, rather than any known rules of construction, have led some of us to suppose excludes a treaty of commerce.

By what process of reasoning will you be able to extract from the wide field of that general provision the obnoxious case of a commercial treaty, without forcing along with it the case of a treaty of peace, and along with that again the case of every possible treaty? Will you rest your distinction upon the favorite idea that a treaty cannot repeal laws competently enacted; or, as it is sometimes expressed, cannot trench upon the legislative rights of Congress? Such a distinction not only seems to be reproached by all the theories, numerous as they are, to which this bill has given birth, but is against notorious fact and recent experience. We have lately witnessed the operation in this respect of a treaty of peace, and could not fail to draw from it this lesson: that no sooner does the President exert, with the consent of the Senate, his power to make such a treaty, than your war-denouncing law, your act for letters of marque, your prohibitory statutes as to intercourse and licenses, and all the other concomitant and dependent statutes, so far as they affect the national relations with a foreign enemy, pass away as a dream, and in a moment are "with years beyond the flood." Your auxiliary agency was not required in the production of this effect; and I have not heard that you even tendered it. You saw your laws departing as it were from the statute book, expelled from the stronghold of supremacy by the single force of a treaty of peace, and you did not attempt to stay them; you did not bid them to linger until you should bid them go; you neither put your shoulders to the wheel of expulsion, nor made an effort to retard it. In a word, you did nothing. You suffered them to flee as a shadow, and you know that they were reduced to shadow, not by the necromancy of usurpation, but by the energy of Constitutional power. Yet you had every reason for interference then, which you can have now. The power to make a treaty of peace stands upon the same Constitutional footing with the power to make a commercial treaty. It is given by the same words. It is exerted in the same manner. It produces the same conflict with municipal legislation. The ingenuity of man cannot urge a consideration, whether upon the letter or the spirit of the Constitution, against the existence of a power in the President and Senate to make a valid commercial treaty, which will not, if it be correct and sound, drive us to the denegation of the power exercised by the President and Senate, with universal approbation, to make a valid treaty of peace.

Nay, the whole treaty-making power will be blotted from the Constitution, and a new one, alien to its theory and practice, be made to supplant it, if sanction and scope be given to the principles of this bill. The bill may, indeed, be considered as the first of many assaults, not now intended, perhaps, but not therefore the less likely to happen, by which the treaty-making power, as created and lodged by the Constitution, will be pushed from its place, and compelled to abide with the power of ordinary legislation. The example of this bill is beyond its ostensible limits. The pernicious principle, of which it is at once the child and the apostle, must work onward, and to the right and the left, until it has exhausted itself; and it never can exhaust itself until it has gathered into the vortex of the legislative powers of Congress the whole treaty-making capacity of the Government. For if, notwithstanding the directness and precision with which the Constitution has marked out the department of the Government by which it wills that treaties shall be made, and has declared that treaties so made shall have the force and dignity of law, the House of Representatives can insist upon some participation in that high faculty, upon the simple suggestion that they are sharers in legislative power upon the subjects embraced by any given treaty, what remains to be done, for the transfer to Congress of the entire treaty-making faculty, as it appears in the Constitution, but to show that Congress have legislative power direct or indirect upon every matter which a treaty can touch? And what are the matters within the practicable range of a treaty which your laws cannot either mould, or qualify, or influence? Imagination has been tasked for examples by which this question might be answered. It is admitted that they must be few, and we have been told, as I think, of no more than one. It is the case of contraband of war. This case, has, it seems, the double recommendation of being what is called an international case, and a case beyond the utmost grasp of Congressional legislation. I remark upon it, that it is no more an international case than any matter of collision incident to the trade of two nations with each other. I remark further, that a treaty upon the point of contraband of war may interfere as well as any other treaty with an act of Congress. A law encouraging, by a bounty or otherwise, the exportation of certain commodities, would be counteracted by an insertion into the list of contraband of war, in a treaty with England or France, any one of those commodities. The treaty would look one way, the law another. And various modes might readily be suggested in which Congress might so legislate as to lay the foundation of repugnancy between its laws and the treaties of the President and Senate with reference to contraband. I deceive myself greatly if a subject can be named upon which a like repugnancy might not occur. But even if it should be practicable to furnish, after laborious inquiry and meditation, a meagre and scanty inventory of some half dozen topics to which domestic legislation cannot be made to extend, will it be pretended that such was the insignificant and narrow domain designed by the Constitution for the treaty-making power? It would appear that there is with some gentlemen a willingness to distinguish between the legislative power expressly granted to Congress and that which is merely implicit, and to admit that a treaty may control the results of the latter. I reply to those gentlemen, that one legislative power is exactly equivalent to another; and that, moreover, the whole legislative power of Congress may justly be said to be expressly granted by the Constitution, although the Constitution does not enumerate every variety of its exercise, or indicate all the ramifications into which it may diverge to suit the exigencies of the times. I reply, besides, that even with the qualification of this vague distinction, whatever may be its value or effect, the principle of the bill leaves no adequate sphere for the treaty-making power. I reply, finally, that the acknowledged operation of a treaty of peace in repealing laws of singular strength and unbending character, enacted in virtue of powers communicated in terminis to Congress, gives the distinction to the winds.

And now that I have again adverted to the example of a treaty of peace, let me call upon you to reflect on the answer which that example affords to all the warnings we have received in this debate against the mighty danger of intrusting to the only department of the Government, which the Constitution supposes can make a treaty, the incidental prerogative of a repealing Legislature. It is inconsistent, we are desirous to believe, with the genius of the Constitution, and must be fatal to all that is dear to freemen, that an Executive Magistrate and a Senate, who are not immediately elected by the people, should possess this authority. We hear from one quarter that if it be so the public liberty is already in the grave, and from another, that the public interest and honor are upon the verge of it. But do you not perceive that this picture of calamity and shame is the mere figment of excited fancy, disavowed by the Constitution as hysterical and erroneous in the case of a treaty of peace? Do you not see that if there be anything in this high-colored peril it is a treaty of peace that must realize it? Can we in this view compare with the power to make such a treaty that of making a treaty of commerce? Are we unable to conjecture, while we are thus brooding over anticipated evils which can never happen, that the lofty character of our country (which is but another name for strength and power) may be made to droop by a mere treaty of peace; that the national pride may be humbled; the just hopes of the people blasted; their courage tainted and broken; their prosperity struck to the heart; their foreign rivals encouraged into arrogance and tutored into encroachment by a mere treaty of peace? I confidently trust that, as this never has been so, it never will be so; but surely it is just as possible as that a treaty of commerce should ever be made to shackle the freedom of this nation, or check its march to the greatness and glory that await it. I know not, indeed, how it can seriously be thought that our liberties are in hazard from the small witchery of a treaty of commerce, and yet in none from the potent enchantments by which a treaty of peace may strive to enthrall them. I am at a loss to conceive by what form of words, by what hitherto unheard-of stipulations, a commercial treaty is to barter away the freedom of united America, or of any the smallest portion of it. I cannot figure to myself the possibility that such a project can ever find its way into the head or heart of any man or set of men whom this nation may select as the depositaries of its power; but I am quite sure that an attempt to excite such a project in a commercial treaty, or in any other treaty, or in any other mode, could work no other effect than the destruction of those who should venture to be parties to it, no matter whether a President, Senate, or a whole Congress. Many extreme cases have been put for illustration in this debate; and this is one of them; and I take the occasion which it offers to mention, that to argue from extreme cases is seldom logical, and, upon a question of interpretation, never is. We can only bring back the means of delusion, if we wander in the regions of fiction and explore the wilds of bare possibility in search of rules for real life and actual ordinary cases. By arguing from the possible abuse of power against the use or existence of it, you may and must come to the conclusion, that there ought not to be, and is not, any Government in this country or in the world. Disorganization and anarchy are the sole consequences that can be deduced from such reasoning. Who is it that may not abuse the power that has been confided to him? May not we, as well as the other branches of the Government? And, if we may, does not the argument from extreme cases prove that we ought to have no power, and that we have no power? And does it not, therefore, after having served for an instant the purposes of this bill, turn short upon and condemn its whole theory, which attributes to us, not merely the power which is our own, but inordinate power, to be gained only by wresting it from others? Our Constitutional and moral security against the abuses of the power of the Executive Government have already been explained. I will only add that a great and manifest abuse of the delegated authority to make treaties would create no obligation anywhere. If ever it should occur, as I confidently believe it never will, the evil must find its corrective in the wisdom and firmness, not of this body only, but of the whole body of the people co-operating with it. It is after all in the people, upon whose Atlantean shoulders our whole Republican system reposes, that you must expect that recuperative power, that redeeming and regenerating spirit, by which the Constitution is to be purified and reintegrated when extravagant abuse has cankered it.

In addition to the example of a treaty of peace which I have just been considering, let me put another, of which none of us can question the reality. The President may exercise the power of pardoning, save only in the case of impeachments. The power of pardoning is not communicated by words more precise or comprehensive than the power to make treaties. But to what does it amount? Is not every pardon pro hac vice a repeal of the penal law against which it gives protection? Does it not ride over the law, resist its command, and extinguish its effect? Does it not even control the combined force of judicature and legislation? Yet, have we ever heard that your legislative rights were an exception out of the prerogative of mercy? Who has ever pretended that this faculty cannot, if regularly exerted, wrestle with the strongest of your statutes? I may be told, that the pardoning power necessarily imports a control over the penal code, if it be exercised in the form of a pardon. I answer, the power to make treaties equally imports a power to put out of the way such parts of the civil code as interfere with its operation, if that power be exerted in the form of a treaty. There is no difference in their essence. You legislate in both cases subject to the power. And this instance furnishes another answer, as I have already intimated, to the predictions of abuse with which, on this occasion, it has been endeavored to appal us. The pardoning power is in the President alone; he is not even checked by the necessity of Senatorial concurrence. He may, by his single fiat, extract the sting from your proudest enactments, and save from their vengeance a convicted offender.

Sir, you have my general notions upon the bill before you. They have no claim to novelty. I imbibed them from some of the heroes and sages who survived the storm of the contest to which America was summoned in her cradle. I imbibed them from the Father of his Country. My understanding approved them, with the full concurrence of my heart, when I was much younger than I am now; and I feel no disposition to discard them now that age and feebleness are about to overtake me. I could say more—much more—upon this high question; but I want health and strength. It is perhaps fortunate for the House that I do, as it prevents me from fatiguing them as much as I am fatigued myself.

Mr. RANDOLPH ROSE.—He said he was certainly very far from being among those, if any there were, who rejoiced in the personal indisposition which deprived the House of the very ingenious, correct, and, he might add, able argument with which they had just been entertained. On the contrary, Mr. R. said, he had listened to it with very great pleasure, as a specimen of the powers of the human mind which he was not often accustomed to witness, even in this honorable House. But notwithstanding this display of eloquence, he was disposed to return to an opinion, which he had entertained when he first took his seat on Monday last, that this question was swoln by the strange, not to say injudicious management of it, to an importance which its real merits do not deserve. I give up to the gentleman from Maryland, said Mr. R.—I am told he is from Maryland—to his utmost fury and indignation, those fanciful and fine-spun theories which seem to interdict the Executive of the United States from negotiating a commercial treaty, or any other treaty whatsoever with any foreign Power. On this point, sir, I agree with the gentleman altogether. I go with him the whole length, that it is competent to the President and Senate to negotiate a treaty of commerce, alliance, and subsidy, with any foreign Power, from the greatest potentate in Europe down to a Chickasaw chief. The honorable gentleman will excuse me when I rise to declare that, howsoever I have been gratified in the display which he has made of his abilities, in one respect he certainly has disappointed me. The honorable gentleman will excuse me when I say he has not met the question. The question, said Mr. R., is not the competency of the Executive to negotiate commercial or other treaties, but its competency, in doing so, to repeal existing laws of the land, and enact other laws in their stead; in other words, the question is, the competency of the Executive to do by treaty that which can be done, as we contend, only by legislative acts. That is the question. If he understood the gentleman, Mr. R. said, he had declared that the bill before the House was not in execution of the treaty; that it contained no auxiliary enactments; that it was not necessary that the bill should pass at all; that it was a twin-brother of the treaty. If the gentleman had pursued his analogy with respect to laws and treaties, he would have found this second twin-brother worthy of being nurtured and brought to man's estate, instead of being treated as illegitimate and stifled in its birth; that this poor little twin, which came second best in the world, had not that fair division of the patrimonial estate which our laws provide; that it was, in short, to be put out of the way, that the Presidential heir may inherit and enjoy the whole estate. If this bill were necessary, then, the gentleman had said that the President and Senate had been guilty of a tremendous usurpation. How far this view of the question might bear on the ultimate vote of the House, Mr. R. said, he could not say; but it would bear very hard upon the President, if the vote should be to-day as it was yesterday. If the argument of the gentleman from Maryland were correct, unless his representations on this head should materially affect the vote of the House, that decision would bear hard on the President and Senate. But a few minutes before the gentleman had delivered his sentiments, the Senate themselves had in open court plead guilty to the charge of usurpation; for they had sent down to this House a bill, either something or nothing, which, if anything, had pronounced their usurpation. If the treaty were what the gentleman contended, ipso facto the law of the land, the bill which the Senate had sent down was mere surplusage. We do not deny, said Mr. R., that a treaty, the ratifications being exchanged, has existence without the sanction of this House—at least I do not deny it—and I am responsible for no man's opinions but my own, glad enough at times if I were irresponsible for them—but I do contend that a treaty does not deprive this House of one jot, one tittle of its legislative and Constitutional authority. I am not, in the language of the learned doctor of laws in Padua, to Shylock, "take thou the pound of flesh, but not one jot of blood;" I am not for giving to the President and Senate the treaty-making power, and then denying to them the use of it; but I am for giving to them all the power, and all the influence which they ought to have in the Government. Whilst the gentleman from Maryland was thinking on the responsibility of the President and Senate, why did he not reflect on our own? Go we not back to be pressed—I hope not to be oppressed—by laws of our own enactment. If the President and Senate go back to the community, to receive their approbation or condemnation—I speak of the theory, of which I may say odi et arceo; for I have long lost my faith in theories, and in theorists too. If the President and Senate feel their accountability to the people, how much more are we amenable to them, when we return with the same responsibility, and at shorter periods, to our constituents? If there be any truth in the old adage, that short accounts make long friends, we shall stand on as good footing with our neighbors as some Presidents who have retired to private life. Our responsibility is greater than that of the President and Senate. What is the responsibility of a man who is to retire after a service of eight or ten years, to palaces which he has built with the plunder of his country; of a man who has enriched his relatives by a species of nepotism, and surrounded himself with a society of his own; who can be content to sit down with infamy in private life, provided his bags are swelled to distention, and his appetite pampered with delicacies which habit has made necessary to his enjoyments? But, granting the argument of the gentleman from Maryland, deeming of the responsibility of the President as he deems, we would make assurance doubly sure, and take a bond of fate for the correct discharge of the Executive functions in this respect. The gentleman from Maryland had said, that if the doctrine supported by the friends of this bill were sound, this Constitution was an anomaly in Government. It is so, Mr. R. said, and he was surprised to hear it found out to-day as if for the first time. It is an anomaly; happy for us that it is, and long might it continue so!

The gentleman from Maryland had said, if the sanction of this House became necessary, to carry a treaty into effect, it was not only in their power, but it was their duty to pass a bill for that purpose. Mr. R. said he would grant the gentleman his position with a small modification; he would grant it if the gentleman would add a proviso, that the provision of said treaty did not betray the great interests, liberties, or rights of the nation. The gentleman had put the case of a definition of contraband by treaty, as being paramount to a law of Congress encouraging the culture of the article declared to be contraband; a case which would, according to his humble judgment, Mr. R. said, better suit a court of admiralty than a legislative hall. But he ought, he added, to be obliged to the honorable gentleman for having taken into his argument an idea which Mr. R. had yesterday endeavored to embody in his own; for, he said, taking the very case the gentleman had put, there could not be a stronger selected to prove that his general argument was untenable. Suppose the Executive were to make a treaty, in which tobacco, rice, and cotton, were declared contraband of war, to which he might add breadstuffs, butter, salt beef, onions, and notions of all sorts; would not this treaty require legislative enactment to carry it into effect; or would it, like a treaty of peace, require no intervention on the part of this House? It would have that effect, perhaps, in a British court of vice-admiralty at Halifax, Providence, or Bermuda; but did the gentleman in his heart believe that such a treaty could become the law of the land on the instant of its promulgation? It could not stand; the breath, the tempest of public indignation, would in an instant sweep it to eternity; it would go to the tomb of the Capulets. The gentleman demands of us, said Mr. R., to exorcise the treaty; to question it, whether it brings with it "airs from Heaven or blasts from Hell;" whether its "intents be wicked or charitable." The treaty, Mr. R. said, came to him in a most agreeable shape; he was disposed to ratify it by legislation; and, if legislative enactment were not necessary, whence the bill which had passed to its third reading in this House; and whence the bill from the Senate? If a treaty were of that pervading force, that, like mercury, it searches the remotest parts of the constitution, why the bill which in this House had progressed so far, and which he hoped would pass to the Senate, whatever imputation, according to the gentleman's argument, it might cast on the Executive of rank and tremendous usurpation.

For his part, Mr. R. said, he was extremely sorry that this should happen to be the only occasion, which had come within his cognizance lately, in which, according to the illustration of the honorable gentleman from Maryland, the House had refused, like the clerk in the church, to make the appointed responses to the minister. Mr. R. said he was not one of those who would construe this occurrence into any imputation on the majority, any more than on the minority of the House; for it happened to be a two-edged sword—it cut as much upon the right hand as upon the left, and as much upon the left hand as upon the right. One side, he said, maintained its consistency, because it cost them nothing, and the other side of the House maintained theirs for the same reason. We are each and all of us, said he, maintaining our consistency, and on the best possible terms—for it costs us nothing. The bill before us gives no power; it takes none away—it bestows no praise, it conveys no censure, except what may be inferred from the argument of the honorable gentleman. Mr. R. wished, he said, that in the future progress of their deliberations, the consistency of one side of the House might be equally maintained; he wished that the spirit of the Administration of Thomas Jefferson, of the first Congress assembled under his Administration, might be maintained by the majority of this House of the present day—even if the minority should, for the sake of consistency, be obliged to take the other side, and load the country with debts, taxes, armies, and navies, and all the constituent elements of Federalism, under the name of Democracy.

Yes, Mr. R. said, he wished that the consistency of one side might be maintained, even at the expense of consistency of the other—but, he believed he was travelling a little out of the record. To return to the question.

Mr. R. said, he would suppose that this commercial treaty had stipulated that a duty, not exceeding a certain amount, should be imposed by the two contracting parties on certain manufactures, peculiar to ourselves only, and operating therefore on us exclusively. Could there be a doubt that this House would refuse to carry that treaty into effect by passing laws laying the necessary taxes, and would leave it to Great Britain, if she chose, to make it a cause of war with us? Have not this House the power, and would they not use it, of carrying such a treaty into effect; or, if it seems good to them, to refuse to carry it into effect, leaving it to the option of the other party to make it a cause of war or not? But, the gentleman had said, grant these doctrines to be correct, and we are the most unfortunate people under the sun—we could have no treaties! Was there any fear, Mr. R. asked—was the theory of our Government so little understood, and the practice so much forgotten, that it could be supposed there would ever be wanting in this House a proper degree of deference (he would not say an improper degree of deference) to the wisdom and counsels of the Executive? Let us suppose it possible, however, said Mr. R., that we should be placed in this unfortunate situation; that it should not be in our power to make a commercial treaty with any people under the sun—I believe the sun would still shine as bright, and the grass grow as green as ever. Are we, sir, to suppose, in this young country, that all diplomatic skill resides with us—and go abroad a treaty-making as Hudibras and Don Quixotte in quest of adventures, expecting to gain all the advantages and receive no blows in return? No two knights, Mr. R. said, were ever more wofully mistaken; but not more than we should be, entertaining notions equally absurd. No, said Mr. R., if we make a treaty with any people under the sun, we must give a quid pro quo, and must always expect to give more than we get. It had been, he said, a maxim in Great Britain before the separation of the United States from that Government, and it was a maxim yet, that whatever she had acquired by the valor of her arms, she had lost by negotiation. The last treaty of Paris might form an exception to the general rule, but, like all exceptions, it would only prove the rule. The circumstance he had referred to grew out of the form of the Government of Great Britain. As the form of our Government is more popular than hers, our proceedings more public, and as we are equally liable to that state of faction which is the shadow of liberty, and proves the substance to exist, until it shall be put down by the strong arm of military despotism—whatever we get abroad we may expect to pay for. We must pay, and dearly too, Mr. R. said, for any advantages we should obtain from those wily Kings and Ministers abroad, who glory in diplomacy, which is but another name for duplicity. After the treaty of 1783, he said, we sent Ministers abroad a treaty-making with every Power that would treat with us, by way of trying our manhood—we had just come of age, taken our affairs into our own hands—he had known many young heirs try their skill in making bargains with their more wary neighbors, until they bargained away their whole estate. To such perhaps, it would be no injurious restraint if they were debarred the treaty-making power until arrived at years of discretion. We shall get nothing at all from these foreign nations, he assured the House, without giving therefor a full equivalent.

The honorable gentleman from Maryland had stated, that if the President and Senate had not the power to make a commercial treaty, and that treaty when made did not instantly become the law of the land, then the President and Senate have the power to make no treaty—and yet the gentleman had furnished in the course of his own argument an instance in direct contradiction of this position—that is, a treaty of peace, which did not in any shape require the sanction of this House. The Treaty of Peace, then, is an exception to the necessity of the intervention of this House to carry treaties into effect; and it might be said that a naked treaty of peace—"let there be peace, and there was peace"—was almost the only treaty which could be negotiated, that did not require the consent of this House. Under the old Confederation, however, it was said Congress had made an alliance with France. This, Mr. R. observed, was a strong case for the gentleman's argument—for it might be said, if the old Congress, confessedly inferior in power, possessed the right to make a treaty of alliance which had been near involving us in the vortex of the French revolution, a fortiori the President and Senate now ought to have the power. He agreed to the force of this argument, if for President and Senate the Government was substituted. This brought him, he said, to the old opprobrium of legislation, that the question started is seldom the question run down—the question was, do the President and Senate possess the power, exclusive and independent of the legislative power, to bind the people in all cases whatsoever, and to make treaties paramount to all law? That was the point—that was the gist of the question—there the argument rubbed.

If, instead of a treaty of commerce, the treaty now under consideration had been a treaty of alliance and subsidy, could the troops have been raised or taxes levied without the intervention of the legislative authority of this House? Mr. R. said they could not; and he had understood the gentleman also to admit this. What, then, was the amount of the difference between the gentleman and himself? It was this: that Mr. R. contended this treaty, being, in his opinion, one requiring legislative enactment to carry it into effect, this House was to exercise its legislative power in this respect under a sound discretion, and a high responsibility for the public good. It was not, in Mr. R.'s opinion, a sound construction, because it was competent to the President and Senate to make a treaty of peace, that they could repeal or modify a law laying a tax. Miserable indeed would be the condition of humanity, if the power to put an end to the calamities of war could not be intrusted to them; and, by the way, Mr. R. said he had no hesitation in saying, that with all the pride, and consequence, and airs that the Government had given to itself, even in this Treaty of Peace, in that simple agreement, "let the conflict cease," our adversary had got a fair and full equivalent, for she got full as much as she gave.

The President and Senate may restore the relations of peace, it had been argued. Might they therefore, Mr. R. asked, repeal all the laws of the land by treaty? But it seemed the President and Senate were controlled by public opinion, and that was a sufficient check—alluding, he supposed, to the press, the great battery of public opinion. Why, then, had it not been said in the Constitution, let there be a public opinion, and all is safe; it is enough for us if the acts of our rulers may be freely canvassed. I believe, said Mr. R., that our rights and liberties are safe, but in a very different repository from that referred to—in the State Legislatures, in the bosom of the free yeomanry of the country, asserted by their muskets and their rifles, and never yielded unless cautiously and warily attacked, unless the ground be broken at a vast distance from the sentinels of public liberty, and the approach secretly made.

Was the sanction of the House necessary to carry this treaty into effect? It was, or it was not; if it was, the President and Senate had been guilty, it was said, of gross usurpation. But the gentleman from Maryland had acknowledged that as there are treaties which are self-executory, there are others which require legislative enactment, and which the aid of the House is required to carry into effect. A treaty of peace, by merely restoring the relations of peace and amity, Mr. R. said, did execute itself. But was it so with a treaty stipulating that duties should be taken off or laid on, or both? The analogy between a treaty restoring the relations of peace between this country and another, and other treaties, cannot be brought in aid of a treaty which is not self-executory, which does require legislative enactment to carry it into effect, as proven by the vote of this House yesterday, and the vote of the Senate to-day, [referring to the bill passed by the Senate declaring the effect of the treaty.] Mr. R. said he could conceive a case in which even a treaty restoring the relations of peace and amity between the United States and another nation, might be received in this House as a breach of national confidence, which the House would not endure. As he liked to bring every case which he presented to this House as near the reality as could be, to liken it to something which had happened, or was very likely to happen, he would take a case which might have happened between the United States and France. It was well known, Mr. R.

said, that a very large description of people in the United States, at the breaking out of the French revolution, had been anxious to plunge the United States into a war with Great Britain and her allies; and it was contended that the public faith was pledged to guarantee the safety of the French West India Islands, &c. The demand of our aid had been made in a much more sacred name than that of a sugar island—in the name of the imprescriptible rights of mankind; the liberty of the world was said to be in jeopardy; the tyrants of the world, it was said, had conspired against liberty, and we ought no longer to withhold our aid. Mr. R. said he hoped no member of this House, nor the most worthless scribbler out of it, would understand him as imputing censure to those who felt thus ardently. By the wisdom of that man who alone, at that juncture, could have held the reins of empire, who alone could have reined in the public madness, by his wisdom we had been saved from being involved in the vortex of that tremendous comet, which

Every patriot, not the pseudo patriot, not he who wishes to ride on the surface of the billow, inflated by his own breath—every real patriot approved and honored his conduct. Suppose, instead of standing in opposition to the feelings of the day, reversing the old adage, Quicquid delirant reges, plectuntur Achivi—suppose General Washington had let slip the dogs of war, hallooed them on, and engaged in that war, which was terminated by the truce of Amiens—or suppose General Washington, as was the fact not long after, had been removed from the councils of his country, and succeeded by a gentleman of different political opinions, and that the first act of the new President had been to patch up a treaty of alliance with the allies, Great Britain particularly; such a treaty as would inevitably, whilst it kept peace with England, have produced war with France; would the people of America have endured this? Mr. R. did not think they would. Such was his opinion of the public sentiment of hatred to Great Britain and predilection to republican France, which then existed, that he believed this House, instead of carrying the treaty into effect, would have been made the means of compelling peace with France, and renewing the war with Great Britain. He would take another precedent, however, from a Government, the constitution of which was not anomalous—a case anterior to the Revolution which, according to the fond idea of British jurists, had fixed the liberty of England on an imperishable foundation; he would take a case from the most corrupt reign of the most corrupt family that perhaps God ever permitted to afflict the world—a case from the days of the Stuarts. He averred it as a fact, and all history, he said, would bear him out in it, that the last of the Stuarts lost his throne in consequence of his subserviency to a foreign Power, which foreign Power was the object of the suspicion, deadly hatred, and fear of the nation he governed. He did aver that the Dutch wars of Charles II—that base and rotten policy laid open more than a century after that wily man thought the evidence of it buried below the caverns of the deep, would have lost him his crown, if he had continued to reign. James II was little else than the successor in form of Charles II; and James II lost his crown as Charles II would, in the end, have lost his, by making treaties against the wishes of the people, with a foreign Power most obnoxious and hateful to the British nation, &c. If such was the case in England, how much more strong is the argument that in this country the President and Senate should never make any treaty, particularly one which requires legislative enactment to carry it into effect, without the previous or subsequent consent of this body.

Mr. R. said, he would trespass on the Committee only by a few other remarks. He was, he hoped it was unnecessary to say, no drawcansir. He was for peace and good will among men. He understood the honorable gentleman from Maryland, when dwelling on the effect of the power of impeachment, which he (Mr. R.) believed would have as much effect on great delinquents as a feather or a flake of snow on the impenetrable hide of a rhinoceros—he understood the gentleman to say, in allusion to a remark that the power of impeachment had been tried and found wanting, that the fact did not necessarily imply—as the honorable gentleman on whom it was tried would have said, it was a non sequitur to urge, that the power of impeachment was nugatory. I grant it, said Mr. R. As little versed as I am in dialectics, as little of a logician or methodist in argument as I am, I am willing to admit that it does not follow, because a felon is acquitted, the law is inefficient, because the acquittal may have arisen from a defect in the evidence, in the law, or in the administration of the law; it may have arisen from another cause, which I would be the meanest and basest of mankind to admit, or it might have arisen from the defect of talent in the prosecuting attorney; and that is one of the crying sins of this nation, which calls loudly for reform. Daily and hourly are felons acquitted because they can give heavy fees to lawyers of great abilities, who know how to make the worst appear the better reason, in the courts at least; while the Commonwealth is content to have its business let out to the lowest bidder, and its judicial business is managed, I will not say in the same manner, but not always well. I do aver that I should be wanting in respect for the gentlemen with whom I was associated on that occasion if I admitted that the inuendo, if I am to understand it as such, of the honorable gentleman had any application to them. I have not the slightest indisposition to admit that it may have application to one, but I believe I see in my eye a much more substantial reason for the acquittal in the case alluded to than the want of ability with which the prosecution was conducted. Mr. R. saw in the ability of the defence of the accused at least as probable a cause of the acquittal as the one which had been mentioned. But, it was really paying to the highest court in this nation a very poor compliment. What, sir! our most potent, grave, and reverend seniors—our very noble and approved good masters—if the doctrine of the gentleman be correct, that what they approve we must ratify—what, sir! the Senate, on the evidence of at least fifty witnesses not capable of making up an opinion on a question presented to them! The acquittal in that case was referable, not to the want of ability on the part of some of the gentlemen at least. Let us look back, said he; one of those gentlemen has since filled the office of Secretary of the Treasury. What, sir! a man placed at the head of the Treasury not capable of conducting an ordinary prosecution in a court of justice. I will never admit an insinuation of that sort to wound the fame of one of my colleagues on that occasion. Another one is now a judge of the Supreme Court, civil and criminal, of the State of Maryland. Was he not capable of summing up the law and evidence in such a case? I will not admit it. Another of the managers of the impeachment has since illustrated the government of Georgia. He has displayed an independence which does him honor with all feeling and independent men. Was he not capable of speaking to an ordinary case before a court? I cannot admit it. No; the acquittal took place, because the Constitution requires, and wisely, as in the case of a treaty, the assent of two-thirds of the court to the condemnation of the accused; and the assent of that two-thirds was not found in the case of impeachment alluded to, while it never has been and never will be found wanting to the ratification of any treaty which the President may negotiate. Mr. R. said, he had received a lesson on that subject which it was not necessary now to repeat. He meant not to tell the secrets of his prison-house. In the year 1800, he received a lesson, which if he was not better, he trusted he should be wiser for to his dying day, touching the nature of the initiatory and ratifying branches in relation to treaties.

One word more, Mr. R. said, and he had done. He wished he had followed the example of the honorable gentleman from Maryland in one respect, incapable as he was of following him in any other. He wished that he too had taken his leave, and sat down when he found his strength exhausted. He had thought it better, however, to finish what he had to say at once, and then to dinner, with what appetite we may. The gentleman had made one statement he wished to notice; that the treaty was a treaty or no treaty; that the ratifications being exchanged, it was law or not law. It is a law in those respects not requiring the intervention of Congress, but it requires legislative provisions, because it requires duties to be lowered or raised, which is equivalent to requiring an appropriation or the imposition of taxes, powers acknowledged to belong exclusively to Congress. What faith, the gentleman asked, could be put by foreign Powers in compacts with this Government, if a treaty may be rendered void after its ratifications are exchanged by the refusal of this House to act on it? There was the widest difference between the possession of a power, and the expediency of exercising it. Suppose a treaty should have received every possible sanction—that of this House included—we still have at any time a right to break it off, without consulting the other party, and go to war. A nation puts faith in other nations, not because of this or that form of Government, this or that check, or this or that balance in the operations of a Government, but according to its conviction of the disposition of other nations to maintain their faith. By that criterion, by that standard of character, ours is at least as good as sterling, and, he believed, a carat better. Great Britain put faith in us for the same reason we put faith in her—tempering our faith—for though scepticism be damnable heresy in religion, it is sometimes otherwise in politics—tempering it with a proper degree of distrust on both sides. If we put faith in a single individual at the head of a Government, as in the case of treaties with European Powers, how much more reason have they to put faith in the guarantee afforded by the pledge of every branch of a Government like ours, representing the whole people of the United States? Before the Prince Regent in England can violate a treaty, and make war, he must be supported by a vote of credit from the House of Commons; this is some restraint on him; but we have made treaties with the despots of every clime and color, from the lily and rose of the North to the jet black of Africa; and yet we are under no sort of doubt that these high contracting parties will adhere to their faith so long as they feel it their interest to do so. It, then, at last turned out, that foreign nations had nothing at all to do with this question; that whether the ratifications are exchanged properly or improperly, was an affair between us at home, with which foreign Powers could not be permitted to meddle; and, Mr. R. said, if he was asked for a just cause of war, he could figure to himself none better than an attempt by any foreign Power at intervention in our affairs. This treaty of commerce gave us leave to trade to the East Indies, and to touch at St. Helena. In that shape it came to the United States, and was ratified here by both Governments—how? In the shape in which it came? No. The very lowest grade of diplomatic functionary, he spoke of his office only—put his finger on one article, and said, beware of St. Helena. A Minister of Great Britain can take a treaty, and make a nose of wax, or any thing else he pleases of it; but the House of Representatives of the United States are to have no word in it. He asked, whether it was competent to a British Minister after a treaty had been solemnly signed under the eye of his own master, materially to alter the provisions of a treaty?—and the alteration was a material one, because the comfort and refreshment of touching at St. Helena was a matter of some consequence in an East India voyage. It was of little consequence, he said, to us, who should be soon dismissed to a good hotel and smoking table; but to the poor scorbutic seaworn sailor, it was of great value. Was it safer for this House to exercise a controlling power on the acts of the President and Senate, so as to meet the coming disease; or that it should be entirely restrained from interfering, and the President and Senate go on making treaties until an extreme case, when the people would interfere and correct the procedure. Mr. R. said, he was no Jacobin; he hoped it was unnecessary to say that. He was no man for a Government of mobs, but of order, law, and religion; but, he said, there are points beyond which the people cannot be restrained; or should we rather let the President and Senate go on, provided they can find a Dey of Algiers to treat with; provided they can find a place to stand on until they make this sweeping treaty-making power a fulcrum to move the Constitution from its orbit? Mr. R. concluded by observing that the Senate had sent a bill to this House; a bill which he considered as yielding the question, and on which it would perhaps be best to act in preference to that now before the House.

Mr. PINKNEY rose to explain—to make a few observations which he said he should have made before, but that he had understood the gentleman to wish not to be interrupted. Mr. P. said that he thought he need not state to the House that his language had not been liable to the exception which the gentleman from Virginia had shown a disposition to take to it. The gentleman had said that impeachment had been tried and found wanting; in reference to which remark he (Mr. P.) had said that the example to which the gentleman had referred was not conclusive in support of that position; that impeachment might fail from various reasons; that the party impeached might be innocent—into which question he had not entered. Mr. P. said he was almost wholly unacquainted with the nature of either of the cases. His language was not liable to the imputation of having sought to reprehend the conduct of the gentlemen who conducted either.

The gentleman had said, that he is no drawcansir. Neither am I, sir. I should not have desired to reflect on the gentleman from Virginia; far from it; I am always disposed to speak in his praise; he has given such proofs of his genius as command my respect. But if I had a desire, which I had not, to cast a reflection on him, what reason was there to suppose I had a desire to do so on those, some of whose names I do not know? I supposed that the House of Representatives had selected men of the first ability, always as competent as any lawyer, to conduct the impeachment. I take it for granted that the impeachment was managed with the utmost dexterity and talent. All I meant to say was, that the failure of that impeachment did not prove that impeachment would always be found wanting. In the case expressly alluded to (that of Judge Chase) I presumed the innocence of the party. This explanation is due not only to the honorable gentleman to whom my remarks apply, but to my own honor and character.

Mr. RANDOLPH expressed his happiness at hearing the remarks of the gentleman from Maryland. The gentleman, he said, had misunderstood him in supposing him not to be disposed to allow the gentleman to explain; from his not having done so, Mr. R. confessed he had considered him as sustaining the inuendo. He reciprocated the sentiments of respect, &c., which the gentleman had expressed, &c.

During the discussion, the bill was received from the Senate, which is noticed above.

Mr. FORSYTH stated the reasons why he hoped, notwithstanding the receipt of the bill from the Senate, that the bill now before the House would pass, as, according to his view, the Senate had, by passing that bill, attempted to evade the question before the House.

The question was about to be put, when Mr. STANFORD having intimated his desire to speak on the question, on motion, the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, January 11.

Mr. BETTS presented a petition of Christopher Colles, of the city of New York, engineer, stating that he has invented a new and useful species of telegraph, and praying, on his relinquishing his patent right therein to Congress, that he may receive in lieu thereof a commission for life—such as they may judge the importance of the subject deserves.—Referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CHAPPELL reported a bill for the relief of the heirs of George Nebinger; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CHAPPELL also reported a bill for the relief of Jonathan White; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. NEWTON,

Ordered, That the Clerk procure, for the use of this House, and also of the Committees thereof, twenty-five copies of Graydon's Digest of the Laws of the United States.

Mr. KING, of North Carolina, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table for one day:

Resolved, That the rules of this House be so amended, that the Commissioners of the Navy Board shall be admitted to seats within the hall of this House.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "relative to cases of naturalization," in which they ask the concurrence of this House. They have also passed a bill "for the relief of Jonathan B. Eastman."

MILITIA CLAIMS.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the committee on that part of the President's Message which relates to an arrangement of the expenses of militia incurred by States without the authority of the General Government, made a report on the petition of P. Andrews and others, and on the petition of the Legislature of the Mississippi Territory, relating to the pay of Nixon and Hind's cavalry; which was read. Whereupon the said petitions and report were referred to the Secretary of War.—The report is as follows:

That, although they are satisfied that the cases so referred to them are not within the purview of the original reference, yet they have taken the same under their consideration, and have come to the conclusion that no legislative act is necessary for the relief of the petitioners.

In the first case, the committee were satisfied that the muster-rolls of the militia, by their own officers, was legal evidence of their claims, particularly when remote from any regular corps; in which opinion they were confirmed, by an inquiry of the Secretary of War, who informed the chairman of the committee, that the regulation requiring the militia being mustered by a regular officer, proceeded from an order of the Secretary of War, which had been recently superseded; and that the necessary order had been given to effect the payment of these militia, on their muster-rolls by their own officers; whereby the benefits required will be had without an act of Congress for that purpose.

The committee were also of opinion that the militia of a Territory, called out as sanctioned by the Executive authority of a Territory, were to be considered as acting under the authority of the United States, and that the laws sufficiently provided for their payment, on the requisite evidence of their services; in which opinion, also, they were confirmed by the concurrent opinion of the Secretary of War.

On the last case, to wit: the propriety of paying the holders of the due bills or certificates of soldiers' claims, to their assignees, the Legislature of Mississippi admits the wisdom of the policy that interdicted it, in the case of the regulars, but suggests the different characters of the militia and regulars as a principle to induce the excepting the case of the militia out of the law. The committee are not sufficiently impressed with the suggestion of the memorialists to induce them to concur in that opinion, but are satisfied that if it was a wise policy in the case of the regulars, it can be fraught with but little mischief in the case of the militia. That it will introduce different rules of evidence in the case of the claims of the militia and regulars, inconsistent with the equanimity of sound legislation, and contrary to the opinion of the Secretary of War.

All which is submitted, &c.

CLAIM FOR HALF PAY.

Mr. CHAPPELL made a report on the petition of Allen McLane; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.—The report is as follows:

That the petitioner was a highly meritorious officer of the Revolutionary army, attached to Colonel Harry Lee's legionary corps, and served until November, 1781, when, by the permission of General Washington, he retired on half-pay for life. He states that, some time after he left the army, he applied at the office of the Auditor of Accounts for his half-pay, when he was informed that Colonel Lee had commuted it, and that, consequently, he was not entitled to it, and that he must take a certificate of five years' full pay in lieu thereof. He denied Colonel Lee's authority to commute for him, and alleges that he never did commute. He, however, admits that, being indebted and hard pressed for money, and finding that he could not obtain a settlement of his account for half-pay, he did, under these circumstances of necessity, accept a certificate for five years' full pay, protesting, at the same time, against its legality. He also admits that he received from Congress a warrant for three hundred acres of land, and states that he was compelled to part with both his certificate and warrant for very small sums. He prays that Congress will now allow him his half-pay for life, deducting therefrom the amount of the certificate which he received.

The committee would be gratified if they could, consistently with duty, recommend the relief prayed for; but they feel that it would be both contrary to law and to policy. The case is barred by the statute of limitations, even if it had never been settled; it is also, according to legal construction, barred by the act of the petitioner himself. The acceptance of the certificate for five years' full pay discharged the obligation of the Government to him. He, however, appeals to the magnanimity and liberality of Congress, and urges that the payments, which were made in depreciated paper, ought not to be considered as a fulfilment of the promise made by the old Congress in their resolve of the 22d of March, 1783; but in this the committee are of a different opinion. The certificate was such as Congress had promised; it was such as the other public creditors received; it was all the Government could give; and, however much it is to be regretted that the public securities of that time suffered a depreciation, yet the petitioner is not more entitled to indemnity for that depreciation than the number of other persons who received Government securities. His case is not different from theirs, and, therefore, proves the impolicy of any measure which shall, at this late period, attempt such indemnity.

He alludes to the acts of some of the States, by which the depreciation of their pay was made up to the officers and soldiers, and grants of land given them, and, therefore, thinks his claim on Congress is strengthened. These the committee suppose were acts of justice or generosity on the part of such States, and are certainly highly honorable to them; but neither the generosity nor justice of any State can impose an obligation on Congress. Congress has fulfilled its promises to the petitioner; and if he has any claim, it is not here, but on that Government which, from past experience, will be ready to reward his merits. They, therefore, feel bound to decide against his claim, but, wishing not to prejudice it, recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition.

COMMERCE WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

The bill from the Senate concerning the Convention between the United States and Great Britain, ratified on the 23d day of December last, was taken up, and read the first time.

The question being stated, "Shall the bill be read a second time?"—

Mr. FORSYTH briefly stated the grounds of his hostility to the bill. He considered it as an attempt on the part of the Senate to evade the question now before the House. Evasion, he said, was sometimes said to be admissible in diplomacy, when dangerous or difficult questions were presented for consideration; but it was never proper in legislation. The bill before the House, he said, was, moreover, not an act to repeal certain acts or parts of acts, but a mere declaration that the laws which contravene the Treaty are of no effect; it was in effect a declaration that a convention between this country and a foreign country does ipso facto repeal the laws of the land. He therefore moved that the bill be rejected.

The question being stated from the Chair: "Shall the bill be rejected?"

Mr. STANFORD expressed his dissent to this proposition, and his impression that the bill from the Senate was in effect the same as the bill now before this House. The fifth section of the latter bill was in nearly the same terms as the bill from the Senate. He was therefore opposed to a rejection of the bill, and moved that it lie on the table.

Mr. FORSYTH hoped the motion to lay the bill on the table would not prevail. There was none of that similarity between the two bills which was supposed by the gentleman from North Carolina. The bill from the Senate proposed a declaration by Congress merely as to the effect of the Treaty on existing statutes; whilst the bill under debate in this House proposed by law to repeal those statutes. Mr. F. wished to throw on the Senate, instead of taking upon the members of this House, the responsibility of rejecting the bill of this House, &c.

The question to lay the bill on the table was decided in the negative, 70 to 62.

Mr. GOLD opposed the proposition to reject the bill, and could not conceive the grounds on which the charge of evasion against the Senate could be sustained. The bill from the Senate being decorous in its form, did it contemplate a proper and legitimate end? It did, he said, and therefore excluded the grounds of the imputation thrown on the Senate by the gentleman from Georgia. Such an imputation ought not to stand on slight ground. It touched considerations of courtesy, decorum, and harmony, between different parts of the Government. When they were once trespassed on, no one could safely say where the controversy would end. If the bill from the Senate contained anything improper or disrespectful to this House, the course now proposed might be proper; but the motion was a strong one, and went to preclude the consideration and amendment of the bill, should it require it, and, in his opinion, would hardly comport with the respect due from one House to the other.

Mr. PICKERING said, he had voted against the bill's lying on the table, and he should vote for the rejection; and yet he preferred it to the bill now before the House. He should vote for the rejection of the bill, he said, because he conceived it not necessary for the execution of the Treaty. He preferred it greatly to the other bill, because, being only declaratory of the Treaty, it was an admission that the Treaty was valid, and could be carried into effect without the intervention of this House. He was in favor of rejecting the bill, however, for another reason than that it was unnecessary; not because he did not feel towards the Senate all the respect due to them; but that he hoped, if the bill were rejected, the Senate would, without hesitation, reject the bill of this House, as an interference with their exclusive power to make treaties.

Mr. Root said, he did not see in the bill from the Senate, any disposition to evade the great question lately under debate in this House; but he did discover a direct determination of the subject-matter of debate—a declaration, that a treaty is capable of annulling our statute laws. It is a declaratory act throughout, in its terms as well as in effect: the bill runs, "Be it enacted and declared," &c. The Senate by their bill had, he said, declared, that a treaty, after being ratified, and its ratifications exchanged, does repeal the statute laws of the country. The body which had ratified the Treaty had pronounced that their act was paramount to all existing laws; this, Mr. R. said, was contrary to his opinion, and he should therefore vote for the rejection of their bill.

Mr. ROBERTSON wished to have again tried the question of laying the bill from the Senate on the table, but the Speaker decided such a motion not now to be in order. Mr. R. then remarked, that this was a question of much importance, and he hoped no passion would intermingle in its discussion, or influence the decision of it, which, whatever it might be, ought to be the result of cool, deliberate consideration. He did not consider the act of the Senate, in sending this bill to the House, as indecorous, but as a proper exercise of their powers. However, it again brought up the whole question, and, with the permission of the House, he would concisely examine it. I was delighted, said Mr. R., with the eloquence of the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. PINKNEY.) I was pleased with his lucid and fair manner of meeting the question, but I was shocked with his principles. I never did hear, I never did expect to hear, within these walls, principles so dangerous as those to which the gentleman has boldly, I was about to say daringly, given utterance. The treaty-making power, according to his doctrine, is without limit; it is without restraint; prostrates before it all the rights of this House, and tramples under foot opinions heretofore held sacred. Whatever treaty, of whatever kind, fall within the powers of any civilized Government, it is competent to our President and Senate to form; if the instrument be in itself complete, if it merely annul and abrogate laws, this House cannot interfere; thus the whole of our statutes, the entire code of our laws, lies at their mercy, and may, with the aid of any foreign sovereign who will unite in the scheme, be forever annihilated. Such is the doctrine of the gentleman from Maryland. Whence does it spring; how has it been supported? Let us probe it to the bottom—let us examine it with deliberation. Where is the legislative power in this Government vested by the Constitution? This is the sole and simple question; if it be not the only point in controversy, then my lips are closed—I have nothing more to say. If the President and Senate can make treaties, without repealing existing laws or making new ones, why let them do so—let them treat, and treat, and treat; they will not alarm my fears; I shall feel no concern. There may be, for anything I know to the contrary, many treaties which do not necessarily include legislation; there are treaties of alliance, triple and quadruple, treaties of neutrality, partition, family compacts, &c.; give them up these; on these, and such as these, they may exercise their treaty-making power. But let them not legislate. There are bounds to this authority, as claimed for them. The legislation of Congress is defined and limited by the Constitution, but treaty legislation has no bounds. The President and Senate, with the aid of a few commissioners and a foreign sovereign, an Emperor or a King of France, a Lord Castlereagh, or any other despot, may govern this people without check, or control, or responsibility. They may—the gentleman from Maryland says they can. They can legislate, although all legislative power is vested in Congress, consisting of a House of Representatives, Senate, and President. They may regulate commerce, although the right to regulate commerce is given to Congress; they may draw money from the Treasury by law, for a treaty is a law. Look to the general powers of Congress; look to the specified; look to the limitations imposed upon that body; leave out this House, substitute a foreign Government; their general powers are usurped; their specified powers taken from them; the limitations imposed for the good of the people utterly disregarded. The President and Senate—let them not legislate; it is the proudest, it is the only prerogative of republicanism. Legislation and representation in free Governments go hand in hand. They are not representatives—they are not responsible. The gentleman from Maryland says they are more responsible than members of this House. How stands the fact? The President is elected for four years, the members of this House for two; but as, under the practice of the Constitution, the Chief Executive Magistrate serves but two terms, the last is without a shadow of responsibility; he does not present himself at the bar of the public, to receive sentence of approval or condemnation. But the President is liable to impeachment. Indeed! impeachment? Yes, to be tried by that very body who advised the ratification of the instrument; to be tried by his accomplices! I ask the gentleman from Maryland if he would make himself laughed at by every man, woman, and child in the community, by bringing about so futile and farcical an exhibition? We see, then, the responsibility of the President; let us examine that of his compeers. The Senators are appointed for six years; not by the people, but by some dozens of individuals who form the State Legislatures; they are not impeachable, if that were in this case of any importance, neither are they amenable to censure, because they transact their Executive business with closed doors; they act in private. No one knows how any Senator votes, he is the sole depositary of his own secret—he votes and speaks as his caprice, his interests, or his judgment dictates—he fears no punishment, for his course is hidden; his Executive powers are exerted in conclave—mark the word, Execu- tive powers—would it be believed, that in the United States of America laws were repealed and enacted in the exercise of Executive business? Why, what an anomaly is this Executive-legislative management!

The gentleman from Maryland goes the full length. If the treaty merely repeals laws, if it require not the aid of this House, the instrument is complete—the deed is done; but if, and according to his doctrine it can never happen, it requires some act of ours; then we have no discretion, we receive orders and must obey, if, after the stabs inflicted on this body, animation still exist. The gentleman tells you to raise your suicidal arm and perpetrate self-murder! worse, your parricidal arm, and plunge a dagger in the bosom of your country, for the Republic no more survives! It contains not one single feature to distinguish it from the despotisms of Europe. If this doctrine prevail, and that equally abominable principle which authorizes the judges to declare the little remnant of your legislation null and void, because, in their opinion, unconstitutionally exercised; hemmed in thus by the Executive and the Judiciary, there is no further use for this assembly. If the Legislature, the pre-eminent authority in all free Governments, be thus blocked up, thus circumvented, and that, too, by comparatively insignificant departments—departments inferior, subordinate, ministerial, then I have no hesitation in saying, that I should not regret the flames that blazed around that once splendid edifice now in view, nor that a similar fate should befall this humble building in which we this day are met; for one, I would not disgrace myself by holding a seat in this degraded and miserable body.

The gentleman from Maryland contends, that whatever treaty may be made by any Power on earth may be made by our President and Senate; that when made it becomes the law of the land; that in this respect their power is universal and unlimited. In what respect? In making treaties which are the laws of the land: in other words, that the President and Senate can make laws of the land on all subjects, and that, too, without limitation. Surely nothing more is necessary than to state such doctrines to make them universally abhorred. But to deny their truth, is, according to the gentleman, to produce the most extravagant anomaly imaginable in the Constitution. Is it not rendering the Constitution of the United States a more extravagant anomaly to strip the Legislature of the right to legislate, and transfer the law-making power to the Executive? If one must yield; if the President and Senate must be retrenched in their treaty-making power, or Congress deprived of the right to legislate, then is there no room for hesitation. Difficulties in regard to intercourse with foreign Governments can only embroil us with them; but an interference with the rights and duties of Congress prostrates the only barrier between the people and despotism, and embroils them with each other. Let us preserve the Union, the Constitution, principles of republicanism, and the privileges of this House; let us guard against the introduction of slavish and European notions of Executive supremacy, and we have nothing to fear from the hostility of a world in arms. But who are they whom we behold in array, supporting the extravagant pretensions of the Senate of the United States? What a singular phenomenon they exhibit: we find them ranged against the body of which they form a part; we find them voluntarily surrendering up the essential principle of their existence, and that, too, in favor of a jealous and a rival department; while the Executive Magistrate, in all Governments sufficiently disposed to claim the full measure of his prerogative, himself admits the power properly to belong to those by whom it is thus so unaccountably abandoned. I assert, that the President of the United States does not believe, with the gentleman from Maryland, that a treaty can repeal or enact a law, and I proceed now to prove it. In a letter dated July 27, 1812, from Mr. Monroe, then Secretary of State, to Mr. Russell, we find the following remarks: "As an inducement to the British Government to discontinue the practice of impressment from our vessels, by which alone our seamen can be made secure, you are authorized to stipulate a prohibition, by law, to be reciprocal, of the employment of British seamen in the public or commercial service of the United States. A stipulation to prohibit by law the employment of British seamen in the service of the United States, is to be understood in the sense and spirit of our Constitution. The passage of such a law must depend of course on Congress, who it might reasonably be presumed would give effect to it." Can language be more explicit; the renunciation of the power ascribed to the Executive more full? Compare it with the language of the gentleman from Maryland? According to him the treaty might have itself repealed, instead of stipulating that Congress should repeal the law in question. There are many other instances of a similar kind; but one, as clear and complete as the present, is of as much value as one thousand. Let it be observed, too, that this is not strictly a commercial affair; and how, if it were not competent to the treaty-making power to act independently of Congress in this case, shall it be contended it can act independently of that body, in commercial questions, notwithstanding the Constitution gives to Congress the power to regulate commerce? The doctrine of the gentleman, properly understood, amounts to what I have already stated—an exclusive right in the President and Senate to legislate for this nation in all cases; it is neither more nor less, nor can ingenuity give to it any other meaning. And why should this enormous this overwhelming power be yielded? Cannot the provision of any treaty be declared by law? Will not reciprocal legislation between independent nations supply the place of treaties? Might not a law contain all the provisions of the convention which has given rise to this debate? Might it not, do I say? Look at the law passed at the last session by the proper authority, it is merely re-echoed by this treaty; a law of the British Government meeting that of ours, would have answered precisely the purposes of their instrument; and the same may be said of all treaties. Why, if Congress cannot regulate commerce, was the power given? Why acted upon? Why the act to which I have referred? The conduct of this House may be accounted for easily enough. We deem the subject placed in part under our control; but why did the Senate legislate? Why did they originate the act? Did they then think that commerce could not be regulated but by the three branches? Was the act an usurpation of the treaty-making power? It commenced with themselves. Was it superfluous, or insufficient? Surely that body will make no such admission.

The House of Representatives contends for no exclusive authority; it contends for such a participation in the Government as is assigned to it by the Constitution. Treaties may be made by legislation; but legislation must not exist through treaties. The right which we assert cannot be productive of irremediable inconvenience. The power contended for by the Senate, and their advocates, subverts the very foundation of the Government—totally changes its character, and establishes rank and unqualified despotism.

The debate now took the general form of that which had occupied the House for several days.

The passage of the bill which originated in this House was successively advocated by Mr. ROBERTSON, Mr. ROSS, and Mr. SHARPE, in speeches of considerable length and strength of argument; and the other side of the question was in like manner sustained by Mr. WRIGHT.

Mr. WRIGHT spoke as follows: Mr. Speaker, I must beg the indulgence of the House, while I deliver my opinion on the bill now under consideration; not, sir, because of the effect of the bill—for it effects nothing but the affectation of continuing a treaty already proclaimed the supreme law of the land—but because I feel it my duty to endeavor to keep the respective departments of the Government within the limits prescribed to them by the Constitution; nor could I suffer even my own impressions of expediency, much less that of others, to operate on my mind in the consideration of a Constitutional question. Sir, we are not sitting to frame, but to execute the instrument, agreeably to the true intent and meaning of the framers of it, by which every honorable man must feel himself bound as in the construction of any other compact.

Sir, this Constitution must be considered, as it was made, a compact among the several States, and its various provisions, as they may operate in favor of the larger or smaller States, as mutual concessions and compromises, for the vast advantages gained by the whole United States by their confederation in one Government.

It is an instrument that has passed the Rubicon, and been ordealed by the scrupulous investigation of its merits in the convention of the States that ratified it; and, sir, could I believe in political inspiration, I should readily ascribe its perfections to that influence. By the second article second section of the Constitution, "the President shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur," and he shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint Ambassadors, &c. By virtue of this power, the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, two-thirds of the Senators present concurring, made and ratified this treaty between Great Britain and the United States, and the President has caused the same to be promulgated by proclamation; after which, it is now proposed to be confirmed by the bill under consideration. And it is contended by gentlemen on this floor, that, as by the first article, eighth section, it is provided, "that Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes;" that, therefore, they have a controlling power over any treaty relating to commerce with foreign nations.

Sir, the treaty-making power is a sovereign power; in Europe their Kings enjoy it without control; here it is vested in the President and Senate. The Senate represented the sovereignty of the States; and the sovereignty of the States, like all sovereignties, are equal, and, of course, correctly equally represented. The renowned Emperor of Russia possesses no greater degree of sovereignty over his vast extended empire, than the ruler of the most petty Power of Europe over his dominions. This equality of power in the States in the Senate, was intended to secure the sovereign rights of the smaller States from the oppression of the larger, and was one of the compromises before alluded to; and I have no doubt the vote on this question will test the necessity of provision, and the justness of the jealousy of the small States, and the propriety of guarding them in the Senate, from the overwhelming power of the large States on this floor, where four States can control the Union, and who are now endeavoring to invest themselves with a concurrent power with the Senate in the formation of commercial treaties.

Sir, while I shall advocate the exclusive power of the President and Senate to make commercial treaties in manner and form, as they have in this case exercised it, I shall not deny to Congress the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, among the several States, and with the Indian tribes. The treaty-making power relates to international subjects. Treaties are compacts between Sovereign and Sovereign, relying for their execution on the good faith of the contracting Powers. Laws are rules of conduct prescribed by the legislative power for the government of the citizen—are national acts, to be enforced by pains and penalties, and executed by municipal authority. The treaty-making power then necessarily relates to the interest of two Powers, and must relate to international subjects. The legislative power can relate only to subjects national and municipal, and be executed by the officers of the Government, whose jurisdiction is bounded by all the United States; hence results the impracticability of legislating internationally, or of treating nationally. No nation can treat with itself, or legislate for another nation. Congress cannot appoint Ministers to treat, nor can she treat as a Congress; but Congress can and must regulate commerce, by fixing the tariff of imposts, the rate of tonnage, and the allowance for drawbacks. This they have done, and this they alone have the power of doing. The treaty-making power have the right, by treaty, to stipulate with a foreign Power, that the same regulations of impost and tonnage, and of drawbacks, which Congress have or may impose on ships and goods, the property of the citizens of the United States, coming into our ports, should be imposed on the ships and goods of the subjects of Great Britain, if they shall enter the ports of the United States, provided they will make the like stipulations in favor of our ships and goods, entering the ports of Great Britain. If there be no commercial treaty with the Power, whose ships and goods shall enter the ports of the United States, the regulations of imposts and tonnage, made by Congress, must be the rule by which such ships and goods must be governed, and be collected by the officers of the United States, appointed for that purpose. But, if a compact, international, is made, giving to each other the right to import into the ports of each other, upon the same terms that their own ships and goods enjoy, and that compact be made by the treaty-making Power, giving a reciprocal benefit to the contracting parties, it must be obligatory, or there can be no power to treat. I ask, if the treaty-making power agrees with Great Britain, that the same impost and tonnage which Great Britain imposes on her own ships and tonnage, coming within the ports of Great Britain, shall also be imposed on the ships and goods of the United States, entering British ports; whether that treaty is not binding on the United States, and whether Congress can, by any law, interfere with such compact, and whether such international act was ever intended to be considered as one of the powers of Congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations; and can it be that the treaty-making power can make such compact with England, clearly within the exclusive treaty-making power; and not be authorized to give the like privilege to British ships and goods, as the remuneration for their grant in the treaty to our ships and goods? Can it be that the framers of the Constitution intended to authorize the treaty-making power to make a compact with a foreign Power, for commercial benefits, and restrain the treaty-making power from remunerating such Power for such benefits? I presume not, and if the stipulation shall be, that the same exact commercial advantages shall be enjoyed by Great Britain in America, as Great Britain extends to America in England, can any man doubt that such compact is just, Constitutional, and conclusive? Can it be that the right to stipulate what should be the international regulation of the imposts and tonnage on American ships and goods, in Great Britain, should be given to the treaty-making power, and the right to fix the remuneration should be given to the legislative power? I presume no man will ascribe to the framers of that instrument so improbable an intention, that one power be intrusted with fixing the quid, and the other power with fixing the quo—such a distribution of power would be contrary to all manner of experience. I cannot conceive that any honorable man can entertain such opinions, unless he has made up his mind to prostrate the treaty-making power at the shrine of the Legislature. It has been shown that the treaty-making power has been expressly given to the President and Senate, and it will be found in that profound and enlightened treatise in the Constitution, The Federalist, 2d vol. p. 201, "that the power to 'make treaties is an important one, especially as 'it relates to war, peace, and commerce, and that 'it is expressly given to the President, by and 'with the advice and consent of the Senate;" and in 2d vol. p. 275, "that the House of Representatives ought to have no power in the formation of treaties." Then the instrument was before the people, and then, with these explanations of the intent of the instrument, it was submitted to the convention of the States, and ratified understandingly, with this exposition, proving affirmatively, that the President and Senate had the power to make treaties and negotiate; that the House of Representatives had nothing to do with treaties. Sir, however plausible the arguments of gentlemen contending for this legislative power may seem to be, yet I trust, when the exposition of the Constitution, which I have had the honor to submit, comes to be clearly considered, and the treaty-making power, and the legislative power, duly examined and compared, they will be found perfectly consistent with each other, and each to revolve on its own Constitutional axis, and within its own orbit, without crossing in any manner the orbit of the other.

Yet, sir, notwithstanding this plain exposition of the powers to legislate and to treat, and the distinct demarcation of their Constitutional limits, the impracticability of treating on legislative subjects, or of legislating on the subjects of treaties, we are called on by the honorable gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. SHARPE) to recollect that we are treading on hallowed ground, that we had recently taken our oath to preserve the Constitution, which the exercise of the treaty-making power by the President and Senate, without the concurrence of Congress will, in his judgment, violate.

Sir, without intending in any manner to question that honorable gentleman's regard to that instrument, or to arraign him for its violations, but only to rescue myself from his unkind imputation, I hope I shall be excused in citing the opinions of that patriot General WASHINGTON on this subject, who presided in the convention that framed the instrument, and witnessed every act taken in that body to perfect it, and perfectly understood the true intent and meaning of every provision and section of it. He, sir, as President, having sworn to preserve this Constitution, at the time of Jay's memorable treaty, almost contemporaneously with the making of the Constitution, and when the subject must have been fresh on his recollection, expressly refused to furnish the House of Representatives with the papers developing the merits of that treaty, over which, he alleged, they had no control, and in which they had no Constitutional agency; whose opinion on this Constitutional question I quote with as perfect confidence of its constitutionality, as I should quote Coke Littleton in a court of common law on a common law question. Yes, sir, and was I to be arraigned even in Heaven, on the charge of the gentleman from Kentucky for violating this instrument, was it admissible to produce the opinion of that virtuous and enlightened statesman, I could have no doubt that it would be highly respected there, where I confidently hope his spirit is a sainted inhabitant.

The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) has expressed great surprise that the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) should have said, "that the act repealing the treaty with France was a judicial act." It certainly was a judgment entered up by Congress against France, "that she had violated that treaty, and that thereby the United States were absolved and discharged from all its obligations." It related to a foreign Power, was international in its object, and not legislative in its character. He repeatedly asked, what? a "judicial act"—a "judicial act!" He said he had never before heard that act called a judicial act, but quaintly remarked that he had frequently heard the act declaring the late war said to be not a "judicious act." Of that, sir, I have no doubt, although the very rumor of that war produced the repeal of the Orders in Council, and the war itself liberated all our impressed seamen, and restored thousands of the native sons of America to the bosom of their country and their friends, who, by impressment, had been long laboring under the most ignominious bondage. Nor, sir, have I a doubt, that if the honorable gentleman will trace the gentry whom he has heard making that declaration back to the war of our glorious Revolution, he will find many of them or their progenitors who declared even that war not a judicious act, although it effected the emancipation of a nation; and, by the establishment of the rights of man on the true basis, the sovereignty of the people, will, it is devoutly to be hoped, effect the emancipation of a world.

The same gentleman, in reply to my honorable colleague, (Mr. PINKNEY,) when speaking of the security the power of impeachment had given, that the Senate should not corruptly violate the rights and interests of the nation, when in the exercise of the treaty-making power, treats the power of impeachment with great levity indeed; that it had been tried in case of Mr. CHASE and Mr. BLOUNT, and had been found wanting, and had convinced him that there was no security in the trial by impeachment, and of its perfect inutilty.

Sir, I had the honor of being a Senator at that time, and although I was one of the judges, who differed in opinion with my associates, who acquitted Mr. Chase, I am, in justice to that body, bound to declare, that it was the most dignified tribunal I had ever beheld, although a constant attendant on courts of justice for more than thirty years. The awful solemnity of that trial has been universally admitted, and has acquired for that body lasting fame; and I very strongly incline to believe that although Mr. Chase was acquitted, that the awfulness of that trial has been a panacæ to all future judicial irregularities. Sir, although I voted on several of the articles of impeachment against Mr. Chase, and that most conscientiously, I never for a moment doubted that my judicial associates who voted that Mr. Chase was "not guilty," were as much under the influence of a pure conscience as myself, nor was I for a moment dissatisfied with my honorable associates who acquitted him. And I had always supposed that after Mr. Chase had been declared by that tribunal, on so full and fair a trial, "not guilty," that that record would imply the absolute verity of his innocence, and that all disinterested men would feel a gratification that Mr. Chase, who had been appointed to that high office by a WASHINGTON, to which his legal talents had so pre-eminently entitled him, had been acquitted, particularly when they recollected that Mr. Chase had been one of the most distinguished patriots of the American Revolution.

But the honorable gentleman from Virginia, and myself, in that trial, acted different parts; I, that of a judge who, with my associates, was bound to decide the question on the evidence in the case, agreeably to the rules prescribed by the Constitution, and to respect the decision as the act of that high court of impeachment, in the discharge of a most solemn duty. He acted the part of a prosecutor, although not less honorable to himself, yet calculated to produce different feelings, particularly as he introduced the charges against Mr. Chase, he felt himself in a certain degree responsible for their verification; and my votes on the several articles of impeachment are his surest guarantee that I have never felt the slightest disapprobation of his conduct in the institution of that prosecution, although I cannot approbate his present persecution.

Mr. LOWNDES then rose, not to enter into the general question, which had been so fully debated, but to express his views of the question before the House. He had great objection, he said, to the proposed rejection of the bill from the Senate. He scarcely could conceive a case, he said, in which the rejection of a bill without consideration would be proper. If rejected, that decision might be the result of calm and deliberate consideration, but such would not be the public impression. The Senate might also in turn reject our bill. In what aspect would this present itself to the public eye? The impression might be erroneous; but it certainly would be, that temper rather than judgment had caused these decisions. Suppose an opposite course to be taken. Suppose that the bill now under consideration should be postponed; and that the House should calmly, temperately, and therefore firmly—for he scarcely ever had known a proper firmness unconnected with some degree of temper—suppose they should thus, after having examined and discussed it, pass the bill originally reported in this House, and that our fears should be realized by the Senate's rejecting it. Suppose this House, uninfluenced by any hasty passion, spleen, or false delicacy, should then take up the Senate's bill, amend it so as to resemble the other one, again offer it to the Senate as, in the opinion of this House, that sort of bill which a sound exposition of the Constitution requires us to pass: suppose, even the worst, that the Senate also reject this bill. The double rejection would then be theirs; and no blame of haste or passion could be attached to this House: the question would stand on its own merits. With these and others views, Mr. L. moved to postpone the bill for one week.

Mr. FORSYTH said he found himself somewhat embarrassed by the observations of the gentleman from South Carolina. He professed, he said, in having made this motion, the most perfect respect for the Senate; it was not profession merely, but his real feeling. The motion he had made to reject the bill had proceeded, not from any spleenetic emotion, but from a perfect conviction that the bill under consideration in this House ought to pass. Mr. F. then stated various difficulties which would result from sending the bill of this House to the Senate, whilst the Senate's bill was undecided on. The gentleman from South Carolina and himself, Mr. F. said, had the same object. Mr. F. had no desire that the House should be governed by prejudices or hasty emotions; he had a desire, that, when it acted, it should act decisively.

Mr. CALHOUN said he was certainly anxious that the bill which originated in this House should not pass; but he was equally anxious that no decision should take place without deliberation and full conviction. As he wished to give a fair opportunity of directly meeting the question which had been debated, he should vote to lay the Senate's bill on the table.

Mr. HANSON intimated an intention to move that the bill should be indefinitely postponed; and said that he purposed to do so, not because he considered (as he certainly did) that the House, in the measures they were pursuing with respect to the British convention, were deliberating on an act of usurpation—not that, in the motion he should offer, or in the vote he might give, he intended to reflect upon the Senate—but because he was convinced that the House possessed no Constitutional power to legislate upon the instrument under consideration. And, whatever deficiency there might be in the remarks he had to offer, he promised that there was one thing, at least, they should not want—brevity.

Mr. H. said, that he did not consider the subject before the House as one of those which afforded gentlemen an opportunity of festooning their eloquence, embroidering it with rhetorical flourishes, or swelling it beyond its natural dimensions, with extraneous and inapplicable matter. On the contrary, he expected that, as it had been pressed before the House, he should find it met in the way that great Constitutional lawyers meet great Constitutional questions.

Taking the business then in this way, it was first for their consideration whether that House constituted a part of the treaty-making power; when they had decided that, as inevitably they must, in the negative, the next question, was the most simple imaginable—namely, where the treaty-making power was in effect lodged—not where it ought to be lodged;—and, on this point, they might be at once relieved from all further trouble of investigation by casting their eyes upon the Constitution, which vests the power in the President, by and with the consent of the Senate, and cautiously and providently guards it by a provision that two-thirds of the Senators present should concur. And this clause, he said, contained the only limitation that was to be found attached to it in that instrument. It was impossible, he said, for language to be more precise or express in conveying the purposes of the human mind, or for words to be more unsusceptible of doubt or misconstruction, than those in which this clause was written: "Shall have power to make." What, said he, can be understood by "to make," but entirely and wholly to accomplish—to render perfect and complete—to leave no part of it undone? If the treaty, then, wanted any part of the process appointed by the framers of the Constitution, even for its completion, it could not be made. But, when it went through the Whole, and obtained the last finishing—namely, the concurrence of two-thirds of the Senate—then it was made; and it would be an absurdity, in terms, to say that more was necessary to its perfection. This concurrence of two-thirds of the Senate was the safeguard erected by the Constitution, who thought it sufficient to preserve it against every abuse; and this construction of it is testified by innumerable contemporaneous authorities, of different political parties and sentiments. This was the construction of President WASHINGTON, and this was the construction of the several authors of The Federalist.

Gentlemen say that the laws of Congress are superior to this power. Mr. H. emphatically dissented from this position. The Constitution created the two distinct branches of power, at one and the same time, and by one and the same instrument—made them co-ordinate and co-existent. By the law of the land, therefore, the treaty-making power was made equal in these points—indeed, even paramount to the other—for it imparts to it the power to repeal it. "All treaties (says the Constitution) are the supreme law of the land." From the moment of its ratification and promulgation, therefore, and according to President WASHINGTON's construction, this treaty became the supreme law of the land at once.

And permit me to say, sir, continued Mr. H., that so it was considered, and this by the Executive of the United States, which may be readily demonstrated by the development of a fact—of which I have been informed, which I do firmly believe to be true, and with which in all probability many people, perhaps even here, are acquainted—and that is, that circular letters of instruction were actually printed and prepared to be sent off to the custom-house officers all over the Union, directing them to conform to the new laws and regulations created by the treaty. In this country we have received intelligence that, under this conviction, the tonnage on American vessels had been reduced in Great Britain; that, by an Order in Council, that benefit has been attached in England to our commerce; and that, in the confidence placed in our fidelity, our trade was without delay exempted from duties, so that there a vested right has been created by the provisions of the treaty. In this country we were equally bound by it as the supreme law of the land, inasmuch that it may be questioned whether, from the moment of the promulgation of the ratified treaty by the President, any merchant could be bound to pay the late duties.

Sir, "this strange confusion,"—this bootless embarrassment—like many other difficulties, arises from gentlemen carrying their party feelings, their prejudices, and their passions, home to the Constitution. That great palladium of our independence had been compared to that miniature representation of the planetary system called an Orrery, in which each planet runs its own little orbit distinct from those of the others, and yet the whole is harmonious and exact. I fear, sir, that the experiments which it seems to be so much the temper of the times to make, will ere long crack this harmony, introduce discord in its stead, and, under that celebrated delusion of the day, invented by Mr. Redheffer—a more just object of comparison than Lord Orrery's miniature plan of the solar system.

Gentlemen complain that the Executive, by this act, trenches upon the Legislative branch of the Constitution. And see, sir, what at the same time they themselves aim at doing! Under the power vested in them by the Constitution, the President and Senate make a treaty; and because appropriations may be requisite, not so much to execute it, as in consequence of its execution, they would take upon them, by a bare majority of this House—perhaps of but one—to defeat that whole Constitutional branch, (the treaty-making power,) assuming, on patriotic pretences, to elevate themselves above it. Would it not be a gross anomaly, sir, if the Constitutional act of the President and the Senate—that, too, not of the Senate voting as in ordinary by a bare majority of perhaps one, but by two-thirds of the Senate against the other third—should be annulled by this branch of the Legislature? Shall it be said, that, because the execution of this treaty might require an appropriation of money—suppose to pay their salaries to the commissioners employed to run our new British line, and gentlemen should take it in their heads to dislike that provision—that therefore this House can, on that miserable pretext, nullify the treaty-making power, and thereby strip our Government of the most essential article of self-preservation—I say, sir, self-preservation, because, what has been done may be done again? And suppose England, liberated from her European struggles, and again at war with us; her hordes of soldiers landed on our shore; our Capitol taken and burnt; our cities sacked, beggared, and in possession of the enemy; our once opulent people, and the repositories of their wealth—the banks—not on the verge merely, but tumbling into the very gulf of bankruptcy—to what refuge should our Government resort to save all that was not already in the enemy's hands, when that sacred part of our Government, the power of treating, was destroyed, or lodged nowhere? Or, suppose all that portion of the country included between Massachusetts and the British possessions were in the hands of the enemy, and by our Ministers at Ghent treating on the basis of the uti possidetis so much of our country was shifted over to Britain by treaty, would this House be competent to legislate for Castine? No. We might declare war against and endeavor to fight for it, if we could, but we could not legislate away the treaty.

Sir, the radical error in this measure, and all the difficulties that hang over the proceeding, arise from a fond indulgence of the fancy in extreme cases—cases that can never, without a violation of the ordinary course of things, exist—from supposing the Executive capable of acts compounded with madness, folly, and baseness; and from supposing it and two-thirds of the Senate rank, corrupt, and profligate beyond example. But, sir, if these things even did occur, the national occasion would provide for itself. On the whole, sir, I consider the interference of this House with the treaty-making power an usurpation; that it would be unjustifiable in us to legislate upon it; that the treaty is capable of executing itself; and that there is no necessity for any law whatever to be enacted in respect to it.

On these grounds, sir, I move that the bill be postponed indefinitely.

Mr. LOWNDES, having further expressed his anxiety to avoid a direct rejection of the Senate's bill, varied his motion so as to supersede Mr. HANSON's, moving to lay the bill on the table.

Which motion was then decided in the affirmative without a division.

The House then resumed the consideration of their bill on the subject, being a bill "to regulate the commerce of the United States according to the Convention of Commerce," &c.; and the question still being "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. STANFORD said, he would beg leave to make his acknowledgments to the House, if the adjournment of yesterday evening was to afford him the opportunity of making the few remarks he had intended to make before the question was taken. He, however, had no wish to consume but a few minutes of the time of the House, and hoped that he would not then do it.

JANUARY, 1816.

Commerce with Great Britain.

H. OF R.

He said, he was an old member, and on the question before the House, as gentlemen debated it, stood committed as to the course he should take, and, under like circumstances, should still feel it his duty to take; but in his judgment the bill before them did not involve the old question, whether this House had, or had not the power, in certain cases, to give effect to a treaty. Such cases might exist, and might well be supposed to exist, where appropriations were called for, or where regulations became necessary, growing out of legislative power to give effect to a treaty, as in the case of acquiring territory—or where the treaty itself should stipulate for some legislative provision in fulfillment of its views. In such cases he held it, he said, that the House had not only the power to legislate to give effect to such treaty, under its own discretion, but, under the same discretion, to refuse to legislate, and defeat the ends of such treaty. Any other doctrine, he contended, would lead to the absurdity of legislation, without the right to deliberate; or to that of voting without the right to judge whether the measure was, or was not, for the public good.

Although, therefore, he did not believe the Constitution gave, or was intended to give any direct share in the treaty-making power, to the House of Representatives, yet that it held an indirect control over a certain class of treaties, he could not be brought to doubt. He meant, to be sure, such treaties, and such only, as those to whose provisions legislation became indispensable—as without the passage of some law of Congress, they could not go into effect; of this description, he conceived those to be, of which he had spoken.

As the most of our treaties, however, were not of such description, but such as were sufficiently full in their details, and went plainly and obviously to their intended objects, it would seem equally absurd to attempt to legislate them into effect—or, in the language of the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. PINCKNEY,) by a law to re-echo the very words of a treaty, thereby to seem to give it effect. Mr. S. said, if his views were correct, and he must own he felt the fullest confidence in them himself, he could not see how gentlemen could press the necessity of the present law, to give effect to or regulate anything in the late commercial treaty with Great Britain. It is certainly a treaty of the latter description, plain and simple in its details, and one which calls for no appropriation, no authoritative law, nor regulation of any kind. Already has the President sent it out with his proclamation, and he must have considered it as having effect from the time, or he ought not to have proclaimed it.

This question came up between the two Houses, under the former British treaty, for the first time, upon a call for an appropriation to carry it into effect. Again, a few years after, under the foreign intercourse bill, when the House claimed the exercise of some discretion in voting for or against the salaries of certain Ministers whom the President and Senate had appointed on missions abroad, which the House did not approve, and thought proper to oppose. In both these instances, the appropriations were made, notwithstanding the opposition; but, in the third instance, an appropriation was called for, and refused, to carry into effect an Indian treaty in the Yazoo country. The reason for this refusal is well known, but the difficulty being removed at a subsequent period, the money was voted, and the treaty carried into effect. Mr. S. said, in the case of the acquisition of Louisiana, legislation became necessary, not only to appropriate money, but to extend government to the citizens of that Territory, and no question or difficulty was made about it, and he felt persuaded it was a rightful claim on our part, to exercise a sound discretion in all such cases.

But how gentlemen brought up the question under the present treaty, he could not perceive. The treaty called for no money, no regulation, no law, as a sine qua non to its existence. As well might we be called upon to pass laws to give effect to the various Indian treaties, which are now going out before the public under the President's proclamation. So far as I know, no one thinks of any law, as necessary to their entire effect.

He would ask, he said, how came it to pass that no law was thought necessary to give effect to the treaty with France, which terminated the kind of war which Mr. Adams had gone into with that nation in defence of our maritime rights? It is not sufficient to say that the friends of his Administration did not pretend to think any law necessary. The fact is, that although the treaty was negotiated and concluded by Mr. Adams, it was at the very close of his Administration, and was of course carried into effect by Mr. Jefferson and his friends, and they never seemed to think any act of Congress necessary to give it effect. So far from it, Mr. Jefferson, without any other law, or rule of construction to guide him, except the treaty itself, took it upon himself to repair the Berceau at the cost of more than thirty thousand dollars, and to restore her thus equipped to France, and he was defended on the ground that it was nothing more than a fair and liberal construction of the treaty, which stipulated the surrender of captures on both sides.

But a case still more recent presents itself. He cited the Treaty of Peace so lately concluded with Great Britain. That treaty went into immediate effect under the President's proclamation, and one of the effects of the treaty was to surrender to the British the islands in the Passamaquoddy with all their population, customs, and laws, and all this by virtue of the treaty, without any law—nor was it even suggested that that House had to legislate about it. Or, are we to understand that all our municipal laws are still in force about Moose Island? That our revenue cutters are still under orders to ply about that island, and guard the United States against smuggling and smugglers from that quarter? Our revenue laws remain unrepealed, and people are bound by them unless the treaty has superseded them; and that it has so superseded them, it is difficult even to make a question. We know that our laws are not there regarded.

Mr. S. then concluded his remarks with observing, that if the arguments of gentlemen be correct, it would seem to him they ought to assume the ground of legislating all treaties into effect as well as this; and if they did not intend to go so far as that, he thought they might well have dispensed with legislating in the present instance. For his part he could not see that it was necessary, and should vote against the bill.

Mr. PICKERING rising to speak, the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, January 12.

Another member, to wit: from Connecticut, TIMOTHY PITKIN, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. HULBERT presented a petition of sundry manufacturers of domestic goods, in Berkshire county and State of Massachusetts, praying that the existing duties on the various domestic manufactures may be abolished.—Referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. HOPKINSON presented a petition of Daniel Pettibone, praying compensation for the use, in the armories of the United States, of a machine, invented by him, for the boring of gun barrels.—Referred to the Committee of Claims.

Ordered, That the petition of the Legislature of the Mississippi Territory, presented on the 29th ultimo, be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the bill to enable the people of the Mississippi Territory, to form a constitution and State government, and for admission of such State into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States.

On motion of Mr. PICKERING, the Clerk of this House was directed to purchase, for the use of the House, five copies of the Laws of the United States.

A motion was made, by Mr. PICKERING, that the House rescind the order of yesterday for the purchase of twenty-five copies of Graydon's Digest; and the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative.

The House proceeded to consider the resolution submitted yesterday, by Mr. KING, of North Carolina, to amend the rules, so as to admit within the Hall of Congress the Commissioners of the Navy Board; and the same being again read, was concurred in by the House.

On motion of Mr. MARSH, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire into the expediency of altering the times of holding the circuit and district courts of the United States, in the district of Vermont.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "confirming to the Navigation Company of New Orleans, the use and possession of a lot in the said city," in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

COMMERCE WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill for regulating the commerce of the United States according to the late convention with Great Britain—the question still being on the passage of the bill—

Mr. PICKERING said, that after so long a discussion of the question before the House, he would not have risen had not some lights, in which it should be viewed, passed unobserved.

In this country, said he, we hold that all the powers of Government originate with the People. Those powers the people might distribute in any manner they pleased. They might have vested all legislative power in one man; in a President, or in a President and Senate, or in a President, Senate, and House of Representatives. To see how they have in fact distributed the powers of Government, we must look to the Constitution, which they have framed for that purpose.

The first clause in the Constitution reads thus: "All legislative powers herein granted, shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives." And the inference of gentlemen on the other side of the House is, that whatever powers are expressly granted to Congress, are exclusively granted; or, if any other branches of the Government act upon the subjects of those powers, the concurrence of this House is necessary to render their acts valid. But if gentlemen will turn to the seventh section of the first article of the Constitution, they will see an important restriction on the sweeping legislative power apparently granted to the Senate and House in the first section: "Every bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate, shall, before it shall become a law, be presented to the President of the United States," for his approbation; without which it will not become a law, unless, on a reconsideration of it, with the President's objections, it shall be approved by two-thirds of each House. Here, then, is one exception to the sweeping legislative powers granted to Congress, as composed of the Senate and House of Representatives, that is, of bare majorities of the two Houses; and a special legislative power is created, and vested in two-thirds of the two Houses, whose concurrence is, in such case, necessary to make a law.

In like manner, is complete legislative power vested in the President and Senate. For we see, in the passage of the Constitution so often recited, that all treaties made under the authority of the United States, are declared to be the law of the land; and the President and Senate are exclusively vested with the power to make treaties, two-thirds of the Senators present concurring.*

* When it is declared, that "this Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land;" no more is meant, than they are supreme in relation to the constitution and laws of the individual States; and hence, after declaring what shall be the supreme law of the land, the Constitution adds, "and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby; anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding." In one other sense, indeed, the Constitution is the supreme law, because it is the act of the people in their sovereign capacity, in the several

H. OF R.

But it is said, that among the various powers granted to Congress, one is "to regulate commerce with foreign nations;" and that if such regulation of commerce be made the subject of a treaty, an act of Congress, including the concurrence of this House, is requisite to make it the law of the land. Here the negotiating of a treaty and the making of a treaty are compounded, although they are perfectly distinct. When a Minister, or other Executive agent, has negotiated a treaty, it is, by the President, laid before the Senate; and when, with their advice and consent, it is ratified by the President, it is made—it is complete; and no act of the House of Representatives can add anything to its validity. The word made is equally applicable to laws and to treaties. "This Constitution, and the laws of the United States made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land."

As to the subjects of treaties: When the framers of the Constitution gave to the President and Senate power to make them, without specifying or limiting the subjects to which they should be confined, it is plain the term treaties was intended to embrace the usual subjects of these contracts between nations. At the time when the Constitution was ordained, we had four commercial treaties—with France, Holland, Prussia, and Sweden; and a treaty of alliance, and a convention or treaty relating to consuls, with France. All these subjects, then, it is certain, are within the treaty-making power of the President and Senate. The convention with Great Britain, to which the bill before us refers, embraces but two of them—commerce and consuls.

But, seeing that Congress have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, why should it be made the subject of treaties? The answer is, to give stability and security to commerce. Suppose the United States and Great Britain, merely by laws of the two countries, had equalized the duties on American and British vessels and their cargoes, in the manner provided by the commercial convention, and suppose that, in expectation of the permanency of those laws, the growers of cotton and tobacco in the United States were to ship those articles in vessels of the United States to Great Britain, and, pending the voyage, the Government of that country should deem it expedient to repeal her equalizing laws, and restore the discriminating duties of tonnage and impost on American vessels and their cargoes; this would bring a very serious loss on those owners. But a treaty would prevent such repeal, and consequent injury.

To a just understanding of the question before the House, another distinction should be taken; that is, between the validity and the execution of a treaty. While gentlemen on the other side (with a single exception) admit that some treaties made by the President and Senate are valid, without any act to be done on the part of this House, such as simple treaties of peace, and even of alliance; seeing no special power is granted to Congress by the Constitution, to make peace and form alliances; yet it is said, that when the intervention of this House is necessary, as in providing and making appropriations of money to carry treaties into execution, then the sanction of this House is requisite to give them a binding force. But let it be supposed that the Constitution, instead of vesting the whole treaty-making power in the President and Senate, had ordained that no treaty should be valid, unless approved by the House of Representatives; and suppose, also, that all the three branches of Government concurring, a treaty of commerce and limits were made, such as that with Spain, in 1795, no one would then question its validity; and yet, unless the President and Senate appointed commissioners to run the boundary lines, to mark the limits of the respective territories, and unless the House of Representatives, concurring with the President and Senate, appropriated money to defray the expense thereof, the treaty would remain unexecuted.

According to the doctrine maintained by the framer and advocates of the bill before us, there have never been any valid treaties between the United States and foreign nations, since the organization of our Government; for no law of Congress has re-enacted their articles, (as is attempted by the present bill,) or by a general enactment pronounced them to be the law of the land. Take up any of those treaties; for instance, the treaties of 1795 with Great Britain and Spain, where the appointment of commissioners and appropriations of money were necessary to their execution. Congress passed laws making such appropriations; not to give validity to the treaties, but simply, in the language of those laws, to carry them into effect.

But shall treaties operate a repeal of a law of the United States? Yes, because treaties being, equally with acts of Congress, the law of the land, they must repeal all the provisions of prior laws contravening their stipulations—according to the well-known maxim, that the latter laws repeal all antecedent laws containing contravening provisions; and so long as treaties exist, so long the Government and nation are bound to observe them, and the decisions of the judges must conform to their stipulations. But as treaties may thus annul the laws of Congress, so may these laws annul treaties; and when Congress shall, by a formal act, declare a treaty no longer obligatory on the United States, the judges must abandon the treaty, and obey the law. And why? Because the whole authority, on our part, which gave existence and force to the treaty, is withdrawn by the annulling act. Such is the effect of a law of Congress declaring war against a nation between whom and the United States any treaties had been made. Take for example the case of France, with whom we had a treaty of amity and commerce, a treaty of alliance, and a consular convention. These treaties having been repeatedly violated on the part of the French Government, and the just claims of the United States for reparation of the injuries so committed having been refused; and their attempts to negotiate an amicable adjustment of all complaints between the two nations having been repelled with indignity; and as the French persisted in their system of predatory violence, infracting those treaties, and hostile to the rights of a free and independent nation; for these causes explicitly, Congress, in July, 1798, passed a law, enacting that those treaties should not thenceforth be regarded as legally obligatory on the Government or citizens of the United States; and two days afterwards Congress passed another law, authorizing the capture of all French armed vessels, to which the commerce of the United States long had been, and continued to be, the prey. And as in this, so in every other case in which Congress shall judge there existed good and sufficient cause for declaring a treaty void, they will so pronounce, either because they intend to declare war, or because they are willing the United States should meet a war, to be declared on the other side, as less injurious to the country than an adherence to the treaty. But should Congress, without adequate cause, declare a treaty no longer obligatory, they must be prepared to meet the reproach of perfidy, besides exposing the United States to the evils of war, should the offended nation think fit to avenge the wrong, by making war upon them.

States; and cannot be changed but by a like act of sovereignty. Hence the laws enacted by Congress are required to be made in pursuance of the Constitution. And although no such restriction is laid on treaties, because treaties embrace some subjects not mentioned in the Constitution, (such as the making of peace and forming alliances with foreign nations,) yet a treaty, no more than an act of Congress, which should contain any provision violating the Constitution, would be of any validity. For the treaty-making power of the President and Senate, as well as the legislative power of Congress, being derived from the Constitution, every exertion of that power in repugnance to it, or involving the abrogation of any of its provisions, must necessarily be void. To maintain the contrary, would be equally absurd as to say, that a superstructure could stand when its foundation was removed, or that a branch could retain life when the root was dead.

A gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) among other reasons why this House should claim, and exercise as a right, the giving of its formal sanction to a treaty, said, that foreign nations would place more confidence in treaties so sanctioned. Mr. P. held the contrary opinion. Foreign nations, he remarked, with whom we should negotiate treaties, would look into our Constitution, to see where the power to make treaties was lodged; and finding it vested in the President and Senate exclusively; if they saw that, in practice, the House of Representatives interposed its pretensions, that the assent of that House also was necessary; and if they saw the President and Senate yielding to such pretensions—to such a manifest encroachment on their exclusive powers—instead of increasing, it would diminish their confidence in the acts of the Government. For confidence is inspired and best secured by the stability of a Government, and the adherence of all its branches to their respective rights.

Mr. P. concluded his observations in saying, that the Senate would feel it its duty to maintain its Constitutional rights. That, having acted with the President in making the Commercial Treaty with Great Britain, which had thus become the law of the land, it was not to be expected that the Senate would adopt the bill before the House, and thus re-enact the articles it had so recently enacted; and in the last article expressly declared to be binding and obligatory on the United States. It would be better, therefore, not to send the bill to the Senate.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, spoke as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the remarks of the honorable member from Massachusetts (Mr. PICKERING) with the attention due to age and experience. The important offices he has held under this Government, and the extended period of his political life, claim for his opinions particular respect. But the tribute of respect is all I can pay. I cannot assent to his construction of the Constitution, as it applies either to the legislative or the treaty-making power. In my judgment these powers, under the Constitution of the United States, are perfectly distinct in relation both to the authority exercising them, and the subjects upon which they can definitively act. A treaty is a compact of accommodation between independent States, relating to their public affairs. It derives all its efficacy from the consent and agreement of the parties; it operates upon the willing only; it is obeyed by the parties no longer than obedience is voluntary. If its engagements are violated, there is no tribunal competent to afford redress; recompense can be found only in the provisions of a new compact, equally voluntary to the first, or in a resort to the ultima ratio regum. The proper subjects of treaty arrangement are, those to which legislative power cannot reach by reason of its limited jurisdiction. Were it not for this, no treaty would, or indeed could, be made; there could be no parties capable of contracting. Freedom of will would be wanting, for it is of the nature of legislative power to impose upon all persons, subject to its jurisdiction, an obligation to conform themselves to the rule it prescribes. It possesses within itself a capacity of making all laws necessary to carry its enactments into complete execution; all other power is inferior and subject to its control. It is restrained only by the Constitution of the Government under which it acts, and limited only by its territorial jurisdiction: "The idea of law necessarily comprehends that of a penalty, consequent upon its violation, of a tribunal which determines the penalty, and a physical force to put it in execution." In a Government where the will of a despot is the supreme law, it is immaterial to the subject whether that will be expressed in the annunciation of a treaty or an edict; but in a Government where the law-making power is vested in three departments, and the treaty-making or bargaining power in two of them, it may become vastly important to national liberty, that these two departments should not be permitted, in the form of treaties, to exercise the sovereign power of enacting and repealing laws. Does, then, the Constitution give to the President of the United States the power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, in the form of a treaty, to legislate for the people of this country, by repealing the laws of Congress and enacting others in their stead? The question is important; it should be discussed with temperance, and decided with firmness. I agree with my honorable colleague (Mr. GOLD) that the present occasion is auspicious for both.

It is admitted on both sides of the House that the treaty now under consideration is well advised, and ought to be carried into full execution on the part of the United States. But it is denied by the honorable member from Massachusetts, (Mr. PICKERING,) and by most of those who, on this occasion, vote with him, that a law of Congress is necessary to give it effect, because the Constitution declares that the President shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and that all treaties made, or to be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land.

Let it be remembered, that municipal law maintains its obligation over all those subjects which are within its jurisdiction, and that a treaty law enforces its agreements or compacts only on public international affairs which municipal law cannot reach. A law of Congress compels obedience to its enactments on all subjects over which legislative power is granted to that body by the Constitution; but what power is more clearly granted than that of regulating commerce? And what law is more purely municipal than that which prescribes the sum of money to be paid on the importation into a territory of a particular article of trade or commerce? It enters into considerations of domestic policy, equally important and various. The wants of the citizens of a State, both in peace and war; the encouragement of their home manufactures, and generally their whole domestic concerns, are affected by it. It is, therefore, a fit subject of municipal legislation. By whom then is such legislation to be exercised? The Constitution, in the first section of its first article, gives the answer: "All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives." The eighth section of the same article, which grants to Congress the power of declaring war, raising and supporting armies, and coining money, grants, in terms equally strong and definite, the power also of laying duties and regulating commerce. But it is contended, that as a treaty is the supreme law of the land, so it attaches to itself the essential quality of all other law, that of repealing former laws contradicting its enactments; and gentlemen have attempted to illustrate this position by calling our attention to the Treaty of Peace, and asking whether it did not repeal the law declaring war? I answer the inquiry in the negative. The act of declaring war is, in most limited Governments, purely executive. The Constitution vests the exercise of that power in Congress, and in exerting it Congress acts rather executively than legislatively. An act declaring the relations of amity which had existed between two nations, to be terminated, may be prefaced with a recital, that the offending nation had committed acts of hostility against the other, and, therefore, that a state of war existed, as was done at the last session of Congress, in passing the act for protecting the commerce of the United States against the Algerine cruisers; or, omitting a recital in the law, it may simply enact, that a state of war is declared to exist between the two countries, leaving the publication of its causes to a report or manifesto, as was done in declaring war against Great Britain. In either case the law is purely declaratory. It presupposes hostile acts to have been committed, and does nothing more than promulgate, in an official form, the existing relations between the Governments concerned. An act declaring war is in its nature also of limited duration. The only legitimate end of war is peace. Surely it is the only end contemplated by the Constitution of the United States. It is to continue in force until relations of amity shall be restored, in the manner pointed out by the Constitution, and no longer. Whenever that event happens, the law becomes inapplicable, and expires by its own limitation. A treaty of peace, therefore, does not repeal an act declaring war.

Neither is a treaty the supreme law of the land, in the same sense that either the Constitution or an act of Congress is supreme. The second paragraph of the sixth article of the Constitution declares: "This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby; anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding."

First, then, the Constitution is supreme, as being the charter of liberty proposed to the people of the United States, by their convention on the 17th of September, 1787, and afterwards ratified by the people of all the States, which cannot be altered by act of Congress, nor by treaty; nor in any other manner than that prescribed by the Constitution itself. It is therefore superior in dignity and authority to every other law. Second, laws of the United States, made in pursuance of the Constitution; and third, treaties made under the authority of the United States, although inferior to the Constitution, are, within their respective powers of making laws concerning the internal, and making compacts relative to the external affairs of the country, supreme in comparison of the Constitution and laws of any State, and binding upon the judges thereof. This construction of the Constitution preserves the harmony of all its parts. It leaves each department to act within its own sphere, and conforms to the rule that, in expounding an instrument, such construction shall be adopted, that all its parts may stand together, and effect be given to each. But the construction, advocated by those who oppose the passage of this bill, on the ground that legislative interference is unnecessary, is in manifest contradiction of the Constitution itself, and the acknowledged powers of this House. If the words "supreme law" are to be applied in precisely the same sense to the Constitution, to acts of Congress, and to treaties, it follows that a treaty is of equal dignity and binding obligation to the Constitution. And, as a posterior law repeals all of a prior date which contradict its enactments, a treaty may alter, amend, or repeal, the Constitution itself. But the President and thirteen Senators may make a treaty—therefore they may, in the form of a treaty, make amendments to the Constitution which cannot be made without the consent of three-fourths of the States in the Union. Their construction is in manifest violation also of the acknowledged powers of Congress. It is admitted by all that if a treaty contain a stipulation, on the part of the United States, to make a payment of money, that it cannot be carried into effect without the passage of a law by Congress making an appropriation for that purpose—why not? Will gentlemen inform me? The Constitution does not say that an appropriation law shall be passed by the Senate and House of Representatives. No, sir; it only says, "no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriation made by law." But if a treaty is the supreme law of the land, capable of altering, amending, or repealing, the laws of Congress, money drawn from the Treasury in consequence of an appropriation contained in a treaty, would be drawn, not only legally, but in pursuance of the supreme law itself. A conclusion, fraught with such monstrous absurdity, has not yet found an advocate on this floor; but such is the inevitable consequence of the construction for which gentlemen in the Opposition contend.

Mr. Speaker, it has been asked, whether the treaty will not be executed even if Congress refuse to pass a law for that purpose. I answer in the negative. By the existing laws, goods imported into the United States from Great Britain in American vessels pay a certain duty, and goods imported in British vessels pay a different duty. By the treaty it is agreed that, in both cases, they shall be charged with the same duty; the treaty does not, neither could it, determine what that duty should be; whether it should be the higher or lower rate, or a modification of both; that could only be decided by municipal law; to make that decision the bill under discussion is introduced; legislation on the subject is thought necessary by the President himself. In his Message communicating the treaty, he says, "I recommend to Congress such legislative provisions as the convention may call for on the part of the United States." Such is not the form in which treaties capable of executing themselves are communicated. For a proof of this I refer gentlemen to the President's Message at the last session of Congress, announcing the Treaty of Peace with Great Britain.

We have already seen that the Constitution, in its first article, contains a declaration that all legislative power shall be vested in Congress. The eighth section of the same article proceeds to enumerate the subjects over which that power may be exercised. "The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises." But of what avail is this power if the President and thirteen Senators can, by treaty, abolish a tax or duty laid by Congress, and establish another? If they can vary a tariff of duties in any particular, they can abolish it altogether. They can agree that all goods, the growth, produce, or manufacture, of the British dominions, shall be admitted into the United States free of duty, in consideration that the British Government will extend the same privilege to American produce imported into Great Britain; or in consideration that the British Government will grant to the United States the provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, to be governed as the President and Senate, or as the President alone, or as any other individual may direct; or in consideration that the British Government would pay to the President of the Senate, or to the Paymaster General of the Army of the United States, an annuity of ten millions of dollars, to be disbursed by the President of the United States, or for any other consideration which they might think proper to accept.

"To borrow money on the credit of the United States."

But of what avail is this power if the President and Senate can repeal the revenue laws of Congress, enacted with a view to pay the interest and repay the principal of money so borrowed; or if they can, by treaty, borrow money themselves and pledge the public faith, or mortgage the public lands, for its reimbursement?

"To regulate commerce with foreign nations."

But of what avail is this power, if the President and Senate can definitively agree, by treaty, with a foreign nation, what articles of commerce shall be admitted into the United States, and what excluded; what duties shall be paid, and what remitted; and, generally, upon all subjects relating to both foreign and domestic commercial transactions?

"To establish a uniform rule of naturalization."

But of what avail is this power, if the President and Senate can, by treaty, stipulate that the subjects of a foreign Government, either shall not be admitted into the United States, or, being admitted, shall not be naturalized, or if they can repeal the naturalization laws enacted by Congress, and establish others contradictory thereto?

"To declare war."

Even this exalted attribute of sovereignty is of little importance to Congress, if the President and Senate can, by a treaty of alliance, bind the United States to commit an act of hostility against a nation with which we are at peace, thereby producing a state of actual war as effectually as if declared by the Constitutional organ of the Government.

"To raise and support armies."

But this grant of power may be rendered useless, if the President and Senate can, by treaty stipulation, fix the number of men to be retained on the Military Establishment of this and another country, with a view to the mutual security of both; or, by a treaty of alliance, determine the contingent of force to be furnished by the United States and the amount of subsidy to be received therefor.

"To provide and maintain a Navy."

This power also is annihilated, if the President and Senate can agree with the Government of another nation, what amount of naval force shall be retained in service by the respective countries.

The Constitutional power of Congress over the militia, if the construction advocated on a former occasion by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. PICKERING,) and his political friends, be correct, (which construction has been sanctioned too by the Government of more than one State in the Union,) is too contemptible to justify a single remark in regard to its possession.

In fine, there is no legislative power granted to Congress by the Constitution which the President and Senate may not usurp, nay, which they cannot lawfully exercise under the construction given to that instrument by the gentleman from Massachusetts, except perhaps the power of exercising "exclusive" legislation over the District of Columbia.

Against such enormous political heresy, I am constrained to enter my solemn protest; if it ever receives the sanction of this House, the charter of American liberty will not be worth preserving; the rights, dignity, and power of this House, derived not from sovereign States, but from a more noble right—the people themselves, whose Representatives we are, whose wants and wishes the Constitution presumes us better to know than any other branch of the Government, and to whom we are amenable for the exercise of the power confided to us, those rights will be abandoned, this dignity sullied, and our power of standing between the people and oppression will be gone forever. The President and Senate, uniting legislative authority to Executive patronage, will manage the concerns of the Government in their own way, not responsible to any earthly tribunal.

Gentlemen, however, have told us not to be alarmed, all is well, there is no danger, the President and Senators are honorable men, good men and true, acting under a high responsibility, with wisdom to discern, and virtue to pursue the best interests of the country. All this may be true, but what security have you, Mr. Speaker, that their seats will always be occupied by men of equal merits? Kings have been bribed and Senates corrupted; what has happened to the Chief Magistrates and Senators of other ages and nations may possibly happen hereafter in our own country.

God grant that it may not, at least, that neither we nor our children to the hundredth generation may see the evil. But should it be the misfortune of the American people to have the administration of their Government committed to corrupt hands, what incalculable mischief would not follow the doctrines of Presidential and Senatorial legislative supremacy! If a treaty should be made, combining in its provisions all the usurpation which I have supposed possible, accompanied with circumstances indicating the most unhallowed ambition, even the poor satisfaction of punishing the offenders would be denied to the people. The Senate is the sole judge of its own members, who are not liable to impeachment in any case whatever, and the President, if impeached, would be tried by judges equally criminal with himself; who, in their Senatorial capacity, advised the very act, for doing which the President would be arraigned at the bar of their House. The absurdity of such a trial is too manifest to require comment.

But it is asked, is this House infallible? Is it proof against corrupt and ambitious influence? Is its patriotism above all price? I answer, that its numerous members, elected for a short period by the people themselves, are at least equally unlikely to indulge projects of ambition dangerous to the liberties of their fellow-citizens, as the members of the Senate, which in practice is almost, and in theory altogether, a permanent body. The people have therefore some additional security in the public virtue of this House for at least honest legislation, which would be entirely withdrawn by the construction of the Constitution against which I protest. And if it happen contrary to my expectation that the Senate shall reject this bill, which I trust we shall shortly send to them for their concurrence, the period will already have arrived when every barrier which this House can erect will be required at our hands to guard the rights of the people against the tyranny of Senatorial usurpation.

But we are again told to quiet our fears, for "there is no danger." Mr. Speaker, it was one of the first lessons taught me by my parents, not to believe in the doctrine of "no danger." I remember to have read in a good old-fashioned book, that it was the doctrine successfully preached by the Serpent to "the mother of mankind." It was in substance the language used by Joab, who too was an honorable man, a chief and a captain over the host, while he was preparing to plunge his murderous weapon into the side of Abner, the son of Ner; and, in fine, it was the language of the Tories in the Revolutionary war. But it never was the language of a Revolutionary Whig. When the British Government imposed a three-penny tea tax upon the people of this country, the Tories, or as they called themselves, the Loyalists, said, "no danger," it is an honorable Government, and the power will not be abused. But what said the Whigs? It is, said they, the principle, and not the sum against which we contend. If we abandon the principle, there is no stopping point; we shall be chained together like manacled slaves, and driven wherever our masters please to drive us. Such too was the language of Republican Whigs in 1798. And it will be the language of Whig principles to the end of the world; examine the page of all history, and you will find the no danger creed recommended by the Catilines, Arnolds, and Leonards of all nations, and resisted by their Franklins, Browns, and Jacksons. We, Mr. Speaker, are the people's watchmen; their sentinels. It is our duty to be vigilant, to guard their liberties, and to sound an alarm at every approach of danger; and, while I have the honor to occupy this place, not one jot nor one tittle of their rights, nor of the Constitutional power of this House, shall be usurped by the Senate, or any other department of the Government, by my consent.

Mr. WILDE said he little thought, when this debate commenced, that it would have been continued so long, and thought as little that, in the course of it, he should have troubled the House with any remarks. Till now, indeed, he had been a mute, as far as he could be, a patient, and he hoped not altogether inattentive, listener. Had his views of the subject been presented to the House by any other gentleman, he should still have remained so, content to prefer, however ignoble the choice, the safety of silence to the hazards of debate. As they had not, he would venture to intrude them as briefly as he could, that at least they might not tire those whom they did not please.

He desired previously, however, to offer a word or two in answer to some arguments which had been urged in the course of this discussion. It had been said by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) that the bill upon your table is unnecessary, because an act was passed at the last session repealing our discriminating duties as to all nations who should repeal their discriminating duties as to us. Now, sir, asked Mr. W., what evidence have we that Great Britain has repealed her discriminating duties as to us? The treaty, indeed, provides that she shall do so, and there is no doubt it will be done. But at present, sir, they are merely suspended by the Order in Council of the 17th of August, which we have seen in the newspapers, and which does not refer either to the words or the date of the treaty, and can as little be connected with the law of the last session. On the contrary, its duration is limited to six weeks after the commencement of the next session of Parliament, pointing evidently to a repeal of those duties by act of Parliament before the expiration of that period; and, by and by, we shall see the act repealing those duties, which it is necessary should be abolished before the law of the last session can operate effectually. Farther, sir, a strict examination of that law will show that, however it might have been intended, its words fairly interpreted, reach only to goods, wares, and merchandise, the growth or produce of the foreign nation, and not to the ships or vessels in which they may be imported; whilst the convention stipulates that all discrimination as to both shall be at an end. The law of the last session, therefore, is not co-extensive with the stipulations of the convention, and cannot supersede the necessity of the present bill. But the passage of that very law, sir, furnishes an argument against the doctrines of the gentlemen who have alluded to it, so far as any argument can be drawn from the practice and opinions of the last Congress. If they believed, as the gentlemen do, that the President and Senate had the power of making a treaty which should have the force of a law in repealing those duties, why was it necessary to pass a law providing for their repeal? Evidently, sir, it would not have been thought necessary; for, according to such a supposition, they must have believed the President and Senate had this power independent of all law. Their passing this law, therefore, is the strongest proof they could have given us of their belief that the President and Senate had not this power.

Mr. W. said, if he understood the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. PICKERING) correctly, he undertook to show, by the uniform practice of this Government since the adoption of the Constitution, that laws had not been passed to carry treaties into effect, except where an appropriation of money was required, and he thence inferred, that laws for that purpose had not been deemed necessary. Mr. W. declared he had examined all the treaties which had been made, and the laws which have been passed regarding them, in conjunction with his friend and colleague who reported this bill to the House, and who gave a brief statement of the nature of the treaties made and the laws passed, and of the evident reasons why, in certain cases, laws had not been thought necessary. His colleague certainly did not go into details; because with such subjects every member of the House was presumed to be acquainted; but the result of their examination was a conviction in them both, that whenever laws had not been passed in conformity with the stipulations of a treaty, it was generally, if not universally, because those stipulations did not touch any of the objects committed exclusively to the jurisdiction of Congress; or, in other words, did not require the enactment of any new, or the change of any old, municipal regulation. To enter into an examination and comparison of those laws and treaties now, would, Mr. W. observed, be to inflict more upon the patience of the House than it would be willing to endure. If, however, a positive precedent upon his part was demanded, he would lay his hand upon it at once; and it was not the less welcome, to him at least, on account of its having been established during the administration of Mr. Jefferson, a period of what he had been accustomed to consider as correct principles. It was the stronger, because Mr. Jefferson, when Secretary of State, is said to have maintained the opinion now supported by the gentlemen on the opposite side of the House. The Louisiana convention, Mr. W. said, was open before him, and he found there a stipulation upon the very same subject, and in form not very unlike that of the treaty now under discussion.

JANUARY, 1816.

Commerce with Great Britain.

H. OF R.

That stipulation provided for the admission of French and Spanish vessels into the port of New Orleans for twelve years, upon the same footing as American vessels; the law which was passed on that occasion did contain a provision to the same effect. [Here Mr. WILDE read the law and the convention.]

The bill before you, Mr. W. remarked, has been called "the echo of the treaty, its reflected image, its twin brother." He would ask, if this law and the article in the Louisiana convention are not at least of the same family, and as like one another as Sebastian and Viola?

Having made this reply to some of the arguments of others, Mr. W. said he would now proceed to offer a few of his own.

If he had not misconceived some of the remarks of the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. PINKNEY,) it was admitted, that a treaty might be either self-executory, or might require a law to carry it into effect. He agreed perfectly in that opinion, but no rules had been furnished for deciding what treaties were self-executory, and what required laws to assist their operation; without such rules, it would be impossible to determine the present question, which is, to what class does this treaty belong?

What the hand of a master neglected to perform, either because his eye was fixed upon greater objects, or because he deemed it unworthy of his genius, the hand of a novice might venture to attempt; for, if he failed, he forfeited nothing but a reputation which is not worth preserving, while if he succeed, he acquires all he can ever hope for—the praise of being useful. The rule which he would offer was probably not such a one as the gentleman himself would have given; certainly not as good an one, possibly little better than no rule at all. He offered it not without hesitation, and it was simply this:

That where the stipulations of a treaty relate entirely to objects purely international or extra-territorial, then they are self-executory, or at most require nothing more than an exertion of the Executive or judicial powers to carry them into effect. But that where they relate solely to objects intra-territorial, objects purely of municipal legislative jurisdiction, there they require the exertion of the municipal legislative authority to assist their operation.

To the first class belonged conventions regulating the reciprocal rights and duties of nations, when one of them shall be belligerent and the other neutral, including the definition of blockade, of contraband of war, of enemy's property, of the right of search, and of all other questions coming within the jurisdiction of the admiralty or maritime courts of either nation, sitting under and professing, at least, to decide according to the authority of national law. In the same class were included all treaties merely of peace. As to these the President and Senate ratify the treaty. The President, as Commander-in-Chief, can suspend hostilities, and the tribunals of prize are competent to do the rest.

To the second class he would refer all treaties, conventions, and agreements, having solely for their object a change, either reciprocal or otherwise, of any regulations merely municipal, in one or both countries. If the change was to be reciprocal, according to his idea, it would require the interposition of the Legislature of each country respectively; if it is not to be reciprocal, it would require the interposition of the Legislature of that country only in which the change was to be effected.

Further, sir, said Mr. W. treaties may be mixed or compounded of stipulations, relating to objects, some of which belong to one class and some to the other.

Of this description are treaties of guarantee, of alliance, of subsidy, of cession, of boundaries, and many others which I will not attempt to enumerate. So far as these relate to objects purely international, they are self-executory, or, at all events, may be executed without the aid of the legislative power. But so far as they concern objects solely of municipal legislation, so far they require the aid of the legislative authority to carry them into effect. If the terms are reciprocal, they will require reciprocal legislation in each country, respectively, so far as they relate to the latter class of objects. If they are not reciprocal, they will require legislation in that country only where municipal regulations are to be altered or affected.

Thus a treaty merely of guarantee or alliance, between two nations, both of whom are at peace, is self-executory; it is perfected by the exchange of ratifications. Its objects are purely international, and require no legislation, because they require no new municipal regulations, neither do they require the change of any already in existence.

But if such a treaty stipulate that one or both parties shall raise and keep up a certain number of troops, this stipulation, if it be reciprocal, must be legislated upon in both countries; if not reciprocal, it must be legislated upon in that country which is to keep up the troops, because as to that country the object of the treaty is a municipal regulation.

As to a treaty of subsidy, that too would require legislation in the country paying the subsidy, because the appropriation of money is a municipal regulation.

With regard to treaties of alliance, with a nation already engaged in a war, as well as to treaties of cession and boundary, they are required to be considered as with relation to the extent of the power vested in the authority making them, as with relation to the objects of the treaties themselves. If the same authority which is invested with the power of making treaties, possesses also the power of declaring war, then that authority may make a treaty of alliance with a nation actually engaged in a war. But if the power of making treaties and of declaring war is not lodged in the same hands, then the authority of the treaty-making power does not extend to such a case; because to make a treaty of alliance with a nation engaged in war, is to make war on the enemy of that nation. Even if the treaty-making power is also invested with the power of declaring war, still all the stipulations of any treaty of alliance which it may make with a belligerent nation, so far as the same relates to raising troops, paying money, or to other objects of municipal regulation, so far will the stipulations of such a treaty require legislative interposition to carry them into effect. On the other hand, so far as such stipulations concern objects merely international and extra territorial, so far they are self-executory, or, at all events, may be executed by the executive and judicial powers, without any legislative assistance.

With reference to treaties of boundary and cession, he would say, that if the treaty-making power of a nation is constitutionally authorized to fix its boundaries or cede any part of its territory by treaty, and does by treaty contract its boundaries or cede a part of its territory, such treaty is self-executory. If by a treaty of cession or boundary it extends the limits of the nation, or acquires new territories, such a treaty, so far as it relates to objects merely municipal, will require legislation; your laws, civil and criminal, cannot be extended over it merely by treaty.

To decide how far any treaty, and particularly the treaty before us, requires legislative assistance to carry it into effect, we must ascertain first, the Constitutional extent of the treaty-making power over the objects of that treaty; and secondly, how far the treaty stipulations concern such objects as are purely international, and are for this reason self-executory; and how far these stipulations relate to objects municipal and intra-territorial, and therefore cannot execute themselves or be executed without legislative interposition.

The President and Senate have power to make treaties; this is said to mean all treaties—treaties of commerce as well as the rest. Granted. Still this does not decide the question. These treaties when made may be either self-executory, or they may require the aid of laws to carry them into execution. Of which class is this treaty? What are the objects of some of its stipulations? Are they purely international or municipal? Extra or intra-territorial? They relate to the equalization of duties. Can anything, he asked, be so entirely an object of municipal regulation? Can anything be more completely intra-territorial?

Let us consider, said Mr. W. the nature of the treaty-making power. Is it a power to pledge the faith of the nation, to anything or to everything; possible or impossible? Evidently not. It is a power to pledge the faith of the nation for the performance of such things only as are naturally and constitutionally possible. Is it a power to pledge the faith of the nation absolutely and without qualification in all cases? Or only absolutely in some cases and qualified in others? Certainly the latter. And this seemed to him the distinction. The treaty-making power is authorized to pledge the faith of the nation absolutely for the performance of all stipulations purely international or extra-territorial, because these are either self-executory, and are in fact partly executed by the exchange of ratifications, as in a treaty of peace; or they depend for their execution on the executive and judicial powers, which are sufficient for that purpose, as in the restoration of prizes captured after the cessation of hostilities; as in the decision of contraband, enemy's property, blockade, the right of search, the change of property, and all other questions of maritime jurisdiction. But as to all objects of mere municipal regulation, it is not authorized to pledge the faith of the nation absolutely and without qualification, because these are to be effected only by laws, and cannot make laws, though it can make treaties. But this treaty is a law, and the supreme law. The answer was easy—it had been given a dozen times. If the President and Senate could legislate by treaty upon one object, purely municipal and intra-territorial, they could legislate by treaty upon all objects purely municipal and intra-territorial. They could lay taxes by treaty, raise troops by treaty, in short, exercise the whole legislative authority of the country by treaty. What then became of the distinction that has been taken between treaties self-executory and treaties which require laws to carry them into execution? One or the other ground must be abandoned. Either treaties operate as laws upon all objects purely municipal and intra-territorial, or upon none. If upon all, every treaty is self-executory. If upon none, then every treaty operating upon such objects requires a law to give it effect. But no object can be more completely municipal and intra-territorial, than the objects of this treaty. What can be more entirely an object of municipal regulation than the imposition of duties? What more completely intra-territorial than the execution of those duties in our own ports? Surely then a law is necessary.

In support of the position that a treaty is a law of the land, and a supreme law, an article of the Constitution had been quoted, and some stress laid upon the argument. If that article is accurately examined, it would be found to refer only to the States. "The judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the Constitution and laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding." If the framers of the Constitution had intended that a treaty should control acts of Congress, would they not have added "anything contained in any act of Congress to the contrary notwithstanding?" Could anything be more obvious? But it had been said, also, that a treaty could repeal a law, and the Treaty of Peace was triumphantly appealed to as evidence of the fact. It is asked, Did not the Treaty of Peace repeal the law declaring war? Mr. W. answered, if it did, still it would not affect his position, which was, that no treaty could repeal any regulation merely municipal. Was war a mere municipal regulation? According to what law is it to be declared and waged? By what law is it regulated? Certainly the law of nations. Can any object be merely municipal which is regulated entirely by the law of nations? Certainly not. There were writers on national laws whose works were confined to a consideration of the rights of war and peace. Mr. W. admitted that raising troops and money to wage war, were mere municipal regulations, but raising troops was not waging war. It was true also that war may be either extra or intra-territorial. Still he would inquire by what law was it regulated? Was it an international or municipal object? But he did not by any means admit that the Treaty of Peace repealed the law declaring war. He held that a law could be repealed only by a law. He said that the law declaring war expired by its own limitation, as soon as peace was concluded. What was the meaning of the law declaring war? He spoke not of its words, but its effects. Simply this: "War is hereby declared against Great Britain, and shall be waged and continue until peace is made?" Would it admit any other meaning? But if, as gentlemen suppose, the Treaty of Peace operated by repealing the act declaring war, then nothing more was necessary than to repeal that act, in order to be at peace. He once indeed had heard a great peace advocate jocularly maintain this opinion. But he imagined it would not be gravely asserted. No, undoubtedly, would be the reply; for the consent of a foreign nation would be wanting. Well, then, Mr. W. added, he could say, even with the consent of that foreign nation, a repeal of the law declaring war, would not make peace, because that would be to transfer the power of making peace from the President and two-thirds of the Senate to the President and a bare majority of both Houses. If, then, repealing the law declaring war, even with the consent of the foreign nation to make peace, would not have placed us in a state of peace, how could it be said that the Treaty of Peace operated by repealing the act declaring war?

Commerce with Great Britain.

Mr. W. said there was one view taken of this subject by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. TUCKER)—he would call him his friend, if their intimacy admitted the expression, for he should think himself honored by the friendship of the gentleman—which he would attempt to enlarge.

If a duty might be repealed by treaty, the whole of our duties might be so repealed. The commissioners who made this treaty, had their instructions admitted, might have stipulated that all American vessels and goods should be duty free in England; all English vessels and goods duty free in the United States. Here would have been twelve or thirteen millions of your revenue swept away at once; and as that revenue is pledged, you would have been compelled to provide other funds for the payment of the public creditor.

Having answered several, Mr. W. said, he would in turn ask one question of the gentlemen on the opposite side. A distinction had been taken between treaties requiring an appropriation of money, and others, because the article in the Constitution is restrictive: "No money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in consequence of appropriations made by law." Whenever money was wanted, therefore, it seemed to be conceded a law must be passed; whereas the article relating to commerce being merely permissive, no law was thought necessary. Now the power to regulate commerce and to make war were given to Congress in the same form of words. Congress shall have power to regulate commerce; Congress shall have power to declare war. Their powers over these objects must be coextensive. He would ask if the President and Senate, under the general treaty-making power, were authorized to enter into a treaty of alliance, offensive and defensive, with a foreign nation actually engaged in war? If they were, then all the most essential powers of the Government belonged to them; they could make war by treaty; they could make peace by treaty; they could raise and keep up troops by treaty; they could lay and collect taxes by treaty, and repeal them by treaty; provide for calling out the militia by treaty; and when gentlemen prided themselves in the check that they could not appropriate money by treaty, they had forgotten that they could borrow money on the credit of the United States by treaty.

For his own part, Mr. W. did not think they could do any of those things, and he should be sorry if they could; and he did not think so because he believed the sound, the true, the safe, and honest interpretation of the Constitution to be, that whatever any branch of the Government could not constitutionally do directly, it could not do indirectly; and as the President and Senate could not make war directly, or regulate commerce directly, they could not make war by treaty, nor regulate commerce (so far as it was municipal and intra-territorial) by treaty.

The power of Congress to regulate commerce, had been called a residuary power, a power to regulate such parts of commerce as have not been regulated by treaty. He had no objection to the term residuary power. He would admit it to be a residuary power, but he said it was a power to regulate such parts of commerce as could not be effectually regulated by treaty. Such parts as require other sanctions than those of the law of nations to enforce them. The President and Senate, Mr. W. said, had power to regulate commerce by treaty, so far as it was purely international and extra-territorial. Congress had power to regulate commerce by law, so far as it was purely municipal and intra-territorial.

The President and Senate could not lay or repeal duties by treaty. Congress could not extend or limit the right of search, or the definition of blockade, or contraband, by law. Thus each had its proper objects, and over those objects the authority of each was complete.

But the treaty-making power necessarily includes the power of pledging the national faith qualifiedly, that certain acts shall be done which its own authority is not of itself competent to do. If it does so pledge the national faith for the performance of such acts, then it was for that power whose aid is required to effect them, to say how far it will redeem the pledge. The form of the stipulation, Mr. W. contended, makes no difference. Foreign nations treat with us with a knowledge of our Constitution, and the stipulations of a treaty are understood with reference to Constitutional powers. The pledge given by a treaty is understood to be a pledge to do all which the treaty-making power can, of itself, perform, and to cause to be done, if possible, by the other departments of the Government, whatever its own power is not competent to do.

A treaty, to be sure, had been said to repeal a law, and, therefore, it would be said that the treaty-making power has in this instance stipulated for nothing more than it was competent of itself to perform. If a treaty could repeal one law, it can repeal another; if it could repeal some, it can repeal all; for he called upon gentlemen to recollect what was so clearly and forcibly demonstrated by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. LOWNDES,) that the restrictions contained in the Constitution were restrictions on the power of Congress, not restrictions on the treaty-making power.

He would add nothing further. He had promised not to tire the House; and yet, though he had only thrown out hints rather than arguments, he was afraid that promise was already broken.

Mr. SHEFFEY said, he was persuaded that the House was already fatigued with the protracted discussion which this subject had undergone. He should, therefore, in delivering his sentiments, be as brief as was in his power. It was most unquestionably true, as had been stated, that the inquiry which it behooved the House to make, was not what ought to be the proper distinction of the powers of the Constitution, but what they really are. If the comprehensive and almost unlimited power contended for, was exclusively vested in the President and Senate, it became the duty of the House, in obedience to the supreme will, to yield a ready acquiescence. But he thought it not unreasonable to contend, that unless that power was clearly granted, and in terms wholly unequivocal, a different course ought to be adopted. If there was a rational doubt, or an apparent conflict in the different parts of the Constitution, as it respects the subject before the House, that construction ought to be given which best comports with the spirit and genius of the Government, and preserves the salutary checks which have been provided against the abuse of power.

The leading features of this Constitution, said Mr. S., are strongly and distinctly marked. Its principal characteristics consist in a distribution of its powers to different departments, and in such an organization of each as tends to check abuses. The legislative, executive, and judicial powers are confided to different public agents, who, in the exercise of their respective functions, act as checks upon each other. The legislative power is so organized as to afford great security against the adoption of improper measures. In the ordinary course of legislation, no act is binding on the nation until it has received the assent of a majority of the Representatives of the people and of the States; and, likewise, the assent of the President, the representative of both. Surely, then, it is not unreasonable to contend (in the absence of any positive provision) that a treaty, made by the President and Senate, embracing the same subjects, confided to the Legislature in distinct terms, ought not to have the force of a law, which has received the approbation of all the constituent branches of the legislative power.

Before he proceeded further, Mr. S. said, he wished to be distinctly understood. He did not mean to contend that the House of Representatives had any agency in making treaties, or that a direct vote of ratification was necessary or proper, but he meant to contend that a treaty did not operate as an absolute repeal of an existing law in conflict with it; and that, when it contained affirmative stipulations, in relation to subjects expressly confided to Congress, a law was necessary to give it effect. This construction will make every part of the Constitution consistent with its own principles, and with the spirit which pervades the whole.

In the distribution of its powers, the Constitution has expressly provided that all legislative power therein granted shall be vested in the Congress of the United States. In a subsequent part, the objects to which it shall extend are specially enumerated. No concurrent special authority, in relation to these objects, is granted to any other department of the Government. But a general power is given to the President and Senate to make treaties, which I admit means all treaties usually among nations. The question then is, does this general power to make treaties, so far as it is exercised, operate to the utter destruction of the special power of legislation; or, shall both have their effect? Among the rules which are adopted, in the construction of the instrument, none seems to be better settled, than that general powers cannot destroy those specially granted; but that when there is a conflict, the former must yield to the latter; and a rule equally correct is, that every part of an instrument shall have its due effect, if possible. Can it then be correctly contended, that the power to make treaties, conferred in general terms, annihilates (so far as the provisions of a treaty extend) the power to make laws, specially granted? Is it not more correct to adopt a construction which will equally preserve the power to make treaties, and the power to make laws, which will give to the President and Senate the exclusive authority to make all treaties, and leave to the House of Representatives a concurrent power in the execution of such as embrace subjects expressly granted by the Constitution to Congress? A very extensive field for the operation of the treaty-making power will still exist. Every treaty of peace, of limits—all treaties regulating the conduct of the contracting nations, when either shall be at war—designating what shall be contraband, or what shall be a legal blockade—regulating the right of search, and many others, will fall within its exclusive jurisdiction; and as it respects those treaties, embracing legislative objects, it will possess the right to form them, in the first instance, and also a concurrent voice in their execution.

Commerce with Great Britain.

H. OF R.

A consideration of the comparative character of the legislative and treaty-making powers tends strongly to support this construction, and to prove, in a manner perfectly satisfactory to myself, that the latter is not superior, not equal, to the former. That which is called sovereign power in every Government, is the power to make laws. In Great Britain, it is clothed with the character of omnipotence, because, as to the objects which it embraces, it is superior to any other human power, and annuls all that come in collision with it. The Executive and Judicial powers are under its control, and subject to its direction. In this Government, the power of legislation is confined to certain objects; but, as it respects these objects, its sovereignty is complete, unless restricted by the spirit or letter of the Constitution. Hence I contend, that as to all legislative subjects, the sovereign or supreme power has been confided to Congress, and that the treaty-making power, (being an Executive power,) so far as it acts on those subjects, is inferior, and subordinate to it.

But it is said, that a treaty, though the act of the Executive department is elevated to an equality, if not superiority, with an act of Congress, by an express provision of the Constitution, in which it is declared, that the "Constitution and laws made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or hereafter to be made, shall be the supreme law of the land." Let us examine this subject. Let us look into the existing state of things when this Constitution was framed. The State sovereignties then existed, and were to be preserved to a certain extent. The powers of the General Government, in their operation, must frequently and necessarily act on the same subjects over which the States retained some authority, and, consequently, produce collision. As it respected treaties, there was another consideration, which made it highly necessary that their relative character should be established. It is well known that much discussion had taken place, and a variety of sentiments entertained as to the force and effect of the Treaty of Peace of 1783. It was contended, (and I think some of the States so construed it,) that the stipulation contained in that treaty, conflicting with the laws of the States, merely municipal, did not repeal those laws. In order, then, that these collisions might be prevented, and a due subordination secured to the authority confided to the United States, it became indispensable to declare it supreme in relation to the States. Hence it has provided, that the Constitution, laws, and treaties, "should be the supreme law of the land, anything in the Constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding."

That the Constitution did not intend to declare what should be the effect of treaties, in relation to the laws of the United States; that it did not intend to elevate an Executive act so as to make it equal or superior to an act of the sovereign or legislative power, but leave it possessed of its natural character, is susceptible of other illustrations. In the European States, where the whole power of the Government is vested in a single individual or in a single body of men, treaties are equal to laws, because they contain a manifestation of the will of the whole sovereign power, in which laws themselves consist. In the Government of Great Britain, however, where the treaty-making power and the legislative power are lodged in different hands, (and in that respect is like our own,) a treaty, embracing legislative subjects, is not equal to an act of Parliament; but depends, so far as these subjects are concerned, for its execution, on the legislature. With the British constitution before their eyes, (and that they had it steadily in view, the distribution of power and the phrases employed sufficiently attest,) can it be supposed that the framers of the Constitution, if they intended to give to treaties the extraordinary effect now contended for, would not have declared so in express terms? I say extraordinary effect, because in the only Government similar, as it respects this question, to our own, treaties, embracing legislative subjects, are not equal to laws. In the clause which declares the Constitution, laws made in pursuance thereof, and treaties made under the authority of the United States, the relative character of each is not designated; and it may be as readily contended that treaties are equal to the Constitution, as that they are equal to laws. If they are equal to the Constitution, then, according to the doctrine on the other side, being last in point of time, they must repeal and supersede whatever comes in conflict with it. In relation to treaties, it is not even declared that, in order to become the supreme law, they shall be made "in pursuance to the Constitution." This, to my mind, proves satisfactorily, that the clause in question did not intend to fix the relative quality of the Constitution, laws, and treaties; but to leave it to that construction which the nature of those acts and the character of the Government would readily suggest.

Permit me now to examine the extent to which the doctrines advanced on the other side would lead us. It has been said that the cases which have been suggested in argument to show the vast and almost unlimited power conferred on the President and Senate by the construction contended for in opposition to the bill, are extreme, and ought therefore to be rejected. But to me it appears obvious, that to test the correctness of any principle, you ought to look to the consequences to which it will lead. One honorable member (Mr. CALHOUN) has contended, that treaties are superior to acts of Congress, and another, (Mr. PINKNEY,) that they are equal; though there is a difference in the force of these opinions, in substance they are the same. They amount to this, that a treaty repeals all laws opposed to it, and that it executes itself. The latter gentleman has indeed admitted that it may sometimes be necessary to pass a law to execute a treaty, but not because there is a defect of power on the part of those who make the treaty, but because its stipulations may not be sufficiently definite. These opinions tend to the utter subversion of the legislative power, at least so far as it is vested in this House. Let us see their tendency. The Constitution has confided in Congress the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations. On this subject, so highly interesting to the people, their Representatives are invested with the right to judge and determine what particular regulations are most conducive to their prosperity. But the opinions stated on this floor authorize the interposition of the President and Senate at any time to supersede this right, partially or entirely, at their discretion; partially, by making treaties of commerce with some nations; entirely, by making treaties with all who have any commercial intercourse with us.

According to the honorable member from Maryland, (Mr. PINKNEY,) if this House should refuse to raise a large military force required by the President, he may accomplish this object by negotiating a treaty with some foreign Power, in which the raising of such force shall be made a stipulation. It is only necessary to make the treaty sufficiently definite; to stipulate the number of regiments, the number of companies in each, and the number and quality of the officers to be employed, and the force, with the consent of two-thirds of the Senate, will be immediately raised; the treaty will execute itself. Should money be wanting to accomplish the object, it may be obtained in the same way by treaty—a thing not unusual among other nations.

Let me pursue the subject. The Constitution has granted to Congress the power to declare war. In the exercise of a power in which everything dear to the people is involved, which causes their blood to flow and their hard earnings to be wrested from them, the co-operation of the Representatives was wisely required. But a treaty may make war without their consent, if we admit the construction contended for. A treaty with a foreign Power may stipulate that we shall make common cause with her against her enemy; the public force will be employed accordingly, and the country thus brought into an actual state of war. The same construction will authorize the President and Senate to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises. Many cases might be supposed illustrative of this position. I will beg leave to state one only. Suppose, in the treaty of commerce with Great Britain, it had been stipulated that British cottons and woollens should pay a duty of ten or fifteen per cent. ad valorem, in the ports of the United States, and that French goods of a similar description should pay forty, fifty, or sixty per cent. Here it is most obvious that the duty which the people of the United States would pay, above the ordinary duty imposed by law, would be levied on them without the consent of their Representatives, though the Constitution expressly provides, not only that their assent shall be necessary, but that all bills for raising revenue shall originate with them.

Congress are authorized by the Constitution to establish a uniform rule of naturalization. In pursuance of which, they have passed laws for the purpose of admitting foreigners to the rights of citizens, on certain conditions: among other things, a residence of five years is required. But if a treaty is equal or superior to an act of Congress, a whole foreign nation may be naturalized by treaty.

The Constitution has committed to Congress the duty of defending the country against foreign and domestic violence, and for that purpose has given them power "to raise and support armies, and to provide and maintain a navy." Suppose a treaty should be made with a foreign nation, in which it should be stipulated that our army should be disbanded, and our navy dismantled, and that no other similar force should be substituted; would the treaty disband the army and dismantle the navy without any legislative provision? If so, then the President and Senate have the entire control of the public defence, and may lay wholly prostrate a most important power belonging to this House.

The construction contended for will authorize the President and Senate to incorporate a foreign territory as a member of this Union. By the Constitution, Congress are empowered to admit new States; but if a treaty supersedes legislation, then it most unquestionably follows, that, by a compact with a foreign nation, foreign territory may be ceded and admitted into the Union, invested with all the privileges of a State.

From a candid and serious consideration of the extent to which we should be led by the high-toned doctrines which have been advanced, I cannot for a moment admit their correctness. Can it be possible that it could ever have been in the contemplation of those for whom this Government was formed, that the powers of their Representatives should be superseded whenever it should please the President and Senate to dispense with them? Is it rational to suppose that the Constitution, which recognises the sovereignty of the people, should intend that a foreign nation, nay, (as has been justly remarked,) a Chickasaw chief, might be substituted for this House, and, as to all the powers given by the Constitution, act in its stead? I think it far more consistent, more reasonable to insist, that all legislative acts, designated as such in the Constitution, must receive the assent of all the constituent branches of the Legislature.

It has been conceded by some gentlemen, in the course of this discussion, that an act of Congress is necessary to execute a treaty which provides for the expenditure of public money; but that this is the only case. I can see no reason for this distinction; the Treaty with Great Britain, now before the House, stipulates, that the discriminating duties, as it respects British vessels, shall be abolished; in consequence of which, our revenue will be considerably diminished. Is there any substantial difference between drawing money from the Treasury, and preventing an equal annual amount from coming into it? If the President and Senate can impose taxes and duties on the people, why not exercise a power far inferior, and apply their proceeds to such objects as they think proper? If a treaty in every other respect is equal at least to an act of Congress, why not in this? Why may not money be appropriated by treaty, when, according to the sentiments of gentlemen, it is the law of the land? It has been said, that the powers of this House are operative only in ordinary cases, where no treaty provides for the same object. With equal propriety may it be said, that the clause of the Constitution which directs, that "no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law," applies only to ordinary cases of expenditure, and not when a treaty stipulates for the payment of money.

It has been strongly urged, that because a treaty of peace puts an end to the war, without the concurrence of this House, it follows that a treaty repeals an act of Congress, as the war must have been declared by that body. But I do not consider a declaration of war as a legislative act, it is not so deemed in Great Britain; and there is nothing in its nature which gives it that character. Among civilized nations, it has long been usual, as well to apprise the adversary nation that in future she will be treated as an enemy, as to manifest a direct respect for the opinions of mankind, to state in a public manifesto the reasons which had provoked a resort to arms. In imitation of this practice, the Constitution had authorized Congress to declare war; but the effect of a declaration of war is nothing more than that those who have the direction of the public force become authorized to employ it against the declared enemy. It establishes no new law. During the continuance of the war, the public law of nations must regulate the conduct and the rights of the parties. To put an end to such a state of things, municipal legislation is not competent; it can only be effected by mutual compact between the contending nations.

It will be readily perceived, that if a declaration of war is not a legislative act, then it is not subject to be repealed, as such acts ordinarily are: and the only way in which an end can be put to it is that already mentioned. According to the understanding of all, to declare war is a distinct substantive act; and to make peace is another. We never heard of peace being made by annulling a declaration of war; hence I conclude, that to make peace is not among the delegated powers of Congress, either express or implied; and that, therefore, a treaty of peace neither repeals a legislative act, nor interferes with any of the powers belonging to this House.

An honorable member from North Carolina (MR. GASTON) has said, that our co-operation is wholly unnecessary; that the President will execute the treaty in question, by giving instructions to the collectors of the customs to conform their conduct to the stipulations of the treaty. This appears to me entirely erroneous. The collectors are not the agents of the President, but the officers of the law. They derive their existence from it, and their duty is prescribed by it. They cannot justify themselves in their obedience to the mere instructions of the President. It must first appear that the act of Congress imposing discriminating duties is repealed, before they can omit to collect them. Whether the treaty effects this is the question before the House.

The honorable gentleman from Maryland (MR. PINKNEY) stated, the other day, that Congress have not the power to make any compact with a foreign Government; that if the President and Senate have not the exclusive power to bind the nation, in all cases, by treaty, then there is no power in this Government to make treaties of commerce and other treaties, embracing any of the subjects delegated to Congress. But it will be observed, that the power on the part of the President and Senate to make all treaties, is not denied; the question is, after they are so made, what is their effect? The principle has been very correctly and ably stated by my honorable friend from Virginia, (MR. TUCKER.) Treaties embracing subjects not confided to Congress, depend for their execution on no other power than that which made them; as to those treaties which embrace such subjects, their execution belongs to the Legislature. In the one case the stipulation is complete; in the other it is only a promise that those who have the power shall make it so.

The honorable gentleman, however, is mistaken in his opinion, that Congress can enter into no compact with a foreign nation; at least the practice of this Government is against him. We all recollect the act of the first of May, 1810, which enabled France, (to use the language of a gentleman from Tennessee, formerly a member of this House,) to twist the cord about our necks which was first scorched by the flames of Moscow, and finally cut asunder by the hands of the Allies at Leipsic and Waterloo. By that act it was stipulated, that if Great Britain or France should revoke their injurious edicts against our commerce, certain acts should be done by this Government. France pretended to accept this overture, and a compact was said to be thus formed, from the effect of which we have just escaped. Last year another law passed, which provided that the discriminating duties should cease in relation to all nations who should adopt a like liberality towards our navigation; in consequence of which, some of the stipulations in the present treaty with Great Britain were adopted. In these cases the President acts as the agent of the law, and not in virtue of his character as superintending our foreign relations.

It has been said that there is greater security in the treaty-making power being exclusively exercised by the President and Senate in all cases, than if the opinions of those friendly to the present bill should be adopted. And the honorable gentleman from Maryland entered into a course of reasoning to show the superior responsibility which attaches particularly to the President, calculated to secure a more wise and more correct exercise of the power. This argument proves too much. It tends to establish, that all the power of this Government ought to be vested in the President, because of his superior wisdom and the superior responsibility of his situation. The gentleman has said much of the influence of public opinion on those who stand in high responsible situations, and has referred us to Great Britain, where he says public opinion is very powerful. I agree with him, that what is called public opinion has great effect on the administration of the Government. It is the unbiassed sentiment of the sound and sensible part of the community, who have not committed themselves to support any set of measures, because they have not participated in the creation of the public functionaries, the King and the Lords being hereditary, and the Commons elected by a very few. But in this country there is very little expression of public opinion, distinct from that which is manifested by election; every person thinks himself pledged in some degree to support the conduct of those on whom he has bestowed his suffrage, and the abuses of power must be extreme before the current of public opinion will set against those who are at the head of a predominant party.

H. OF R.

Commerce with Great Britain.

JANUARY, 1816.

If the construction contended for on the other side should receive the assent of this House, I hesitate not to say, that there will be less security, less responsibility, than in Great Britain. On one subject there has always been great jealousy there; I mean the introduction of foreign troops. It is a settled maxim of their constitution, that they cannot be introduced without the consent of Parliament; but in this country there would be no such security. Should we refuse to gratify an ambitious President who designed to subvert the liberties of this country with a large army, he may negotiate with a foreign Power, and, with the assent of two-thirds of the Senate, introduce foreign troops. I cannot believe that the people ever did intend to confer power thus tending to jeopardize those liberties for the preservation of which this Constitution was adopted.

Mr. HOPKINSON spoke as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I am indeed sincere, when I assure you and this honorable House, that I am most reluctant, at this late hour of the day, the usual time of adjournment, to solicit your attention to some remarks upon the bill now offered for your sanction, and which must now receive that sanction or a decisive rejection. In an early stage of this business, I gave to your consideration a few observations in opposition to the bill, which were the offspring of the moment, having neither the maturity of reflection, nor the strength of arrangement. Since then, however, the bill has assumed a shape of greater magnitude; and the discussion of it has developed principles so interesting and important; discriminations so various and minute; and positions so novel and contradictory, that I should feel myself wanting in duty, were I to refuse the only opportunity I can ever have of bearing my voice and testimony against them. Before, however, I presume to hope for your indulgent attention at so late a stage of the debate, that every member was looking for the question to be put; and so late an hour of the day, that we are all weary of these walls, I beg leave to remind you that the debate on this bill was not renewed by the minority; after it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading by a very considerable majority, as far as I know, no further attempts would have been made to arrest or impede its progress, because no rational hope existed of finally preventing its enactment. The victorious majority, however, were not satisfied to let this matter go to rest in this way; for I beg you to recollect that, when the bill was presented to the House for its passage into a law, three gentlemen of the majority thought it necessary to address the House in support of it, before a word was uttered from us to impeach it. Was it not natural, then, that this over anxiety about the fate of a bill, sanctioned already by so large a vote, this renewed exertion to support that which was already so strongly supported, should excite in us a suspicion that a weakness was felt somewhere, which it was our duty to seek for and expose; that some vital defect existed in the cause or the argument which gave this alarm, and called for additional aid? Or was it, Mr. Speaker, that the majority, not content with the triumph of success, not satisfied with the prostration of the adversary, would thus pursue and assault him, defeated and overthrown? If this was the feeling which stimulated the honorable gentlemen to a renewal of the conflict, surely we may be pardoned for repelling the attack with all our powers, and rousing our energies to the utmost exertion of resistance. If, then, there has been waste of time, and fatigue of spirits in the continuance of this debate, surely we stand acquitted of the fault and its consequences. This, however, of itself, I confess, would not be a sufficient apology for my intrusion upon your attention again; unless I may add to it the belief, that I may still present the case in some aspects, in which it has not yet been presented. I will assuredly not recur to the ground taken by me in my first address.

Let me entreat the House to bring back their attention to the true and single question to be decided on; and to that instrument by which that decision must be governed and directed. We are not now sitting in convention to frame a constitution for the United States; but in Congress, to pass a law under a Constitution already framed. This law we must conform to that Constitution; and we are bound to submit to the distribution of power as made by the Constitution, whatever our opinions may be of its wisdom, its expediency, or its consistence with the rights or claims of the popular branch of the Government. We must inquire what the Constitution is, and not what honorable gentlemen may wish it to be. After, therefore listening, with due respect and terror too, if you please, to all the doubts and dangers, suspicions and jealousies, forebodings of ruin, and execrations of sectional power, which ingenuity may suggest, or imagination give birth or shape to, we must at last lay down all this extravagance, dismiss all these phantoms, and soberly take up this little book, the Constitution; examine what it commands to be done, and make up our minds to submit to it. We must not amuse or deceive ourselves with large estimations of our own power and importance, claiming, as some gentlemen have done, the sovereignty of the people to reside in us, but calmly consider ourselves as acting under a delegated, limited, distributed authority, which gives to us all we have, and marks the extent of it; and which, with equal right and independence, gives to the other branches of this confederated Government their powers and their limits also. To this great authority, this charter of our powers and our duties, we must all submit; and I cannot question that every member of this House has a ready and willing disposition to conform himself and his vote to the directions here given; I confidently believe that I have but to satisfy them of the truth of the construction we contend for, to be secure of their acquiescence in it.

How stands the question, then, under and by the Constitution? How do the principles and arguments of the supporters of the bill abide this test? I state the question to be, "whether a treaty, constitutionally made, does or does not repeal a law, inconsistent with it, also made constitutionally?" This puts the case fairly and simply before the House. A treaty, admitted to be on a subject within the treaty-making power, not in conflict with any of the provisions of the Constitution, nor overstepping any of the marked boundaries therein set; and concluded, ratified, and exchanged, in the manner, by the authorities and under the forms prescribed by the Constitution; is in opposition or contradiction to a municipal law enacted by Congress, in the ordinary course of legislation; and the question is, whether a treaty thus made subsequently to the law, does not, of itself, repeal the law; or must the authority of the House be called in aid of the treaty to repeal and remove the law in conflict with it? I will now, sir, state, with equal precision, the position I mean to maintain in the argument of this question. It is this: that there is no possible case, real or imagined, in which the vote or sanction of this House is necessary, or can be effectual, either to confirm or destroy a treaty thus made. There is no case under the Constitution in which this House ever can have a direct control, an affirmative or negative vote on the validity or invalidity of a treaty. A treaty may fail to have effect; its execution may be prevented; but its validity as a contract, legal and binding, cannot be touched by this House. It may be a broken, a violated contract, but it is still a contract. When something is necessary for the execution of the provisions of a treaty, or some of them, which something is exclusively within the power of this House, it may indeed be refused; but this affects not the nature of the contract, which received its character, its Constitutional efficacy and obligation from the hands of the President and the Senate, who have been intrusted by the people with the power thus to bind them. This House may, in the exercise of their power over some collateral matter, as money, for instance, interfere with, and perhaps prevent, the fulfilment or execution of a treaty; but they do it by a violation of the public faith, and not by invalidating the treaty which bound it. They may refuse to grant the means necessary to the performance of the contract, but they cannot decree it to be no contract. The same thing, sir, may happen in private life, in the common transactions of men. One may solemnly make a contract, and daringly refuse to fulfil it; but is it, therefore, no contract? He may, indeed, be unable to perform it, but can he, therefore, say he was never bound? Believing it to be in my power to obtain a certain tract of land, or a quantity of stock, I bind myself, for a good consideration, to sell and deliver it to another. I afterwards find I cannot induce the holder of the land to part with it, or cannot procure the stock. Shall I, therefore, say to the disappointed and abused party with whom I made this engagement, that I am no longer bound by it; nay, that it never was a contract at all, because I made a bad calculation of my means to perform it, although I made no such restriction, reservation, or condition, with him? Assuredly, not. So, when the Republic, by her Constitutional organs, which is in fact, by herself, has made, concluded, ratified, and exchanged a treaty with a foreign Power, shall she nullify and avoid it, ab initio, by declaring her inability to induce another branch of her power to furnish the means necessary to its execution? With what indignation and contempt would such a pretence be received by the other party, and by the world? But, it is asked, what is a contract that cannot be enforced; a treaty that cannot be carried into effect? I answer, sir, that, in the case of the individual, the courts of justice would punish this hardihood of fraud; and, in the case of nations, there being no such common arbiter to do and compel justice to be done between the parties, the faithless one must stand ready to defend her breach of faith with the sword of her citizens and the waste of her treasures, amidst the scorn of the world. She must look to the "ultima ratio regum" for her justification and support; and she must abide this solemn appeal with a bad conscience, in a bad cause. But, sir, before this appeal, and during the appeal, and after it, be its result what it may, the original soundness and validity of the contract remains unimpaired and unimpairable, by the chances or the issue of an unjust contest, in defence of a violated faith.

Permit me, sir, to recall your attention to the circumstances of the British Treaty of 1794, which has been resorted to as a text of argument on both sides of the House. That treaty was negotiated by a Minister duly authorized, and was afterwards, with all Constitutional form and ceremony, ratified and exchanged by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The merits and provisions of the treaty were afterwards examined and discussed with unusual animation, not to say violence, in the House of Representatives. But how was this done? Was the treaty ever laid formally before them, for their concurrence or opinion? Was the advice of the House asked, as to the expediency or inexpediency of any of its provisions? Was the question, treaty or no treaty—ratify or not ratify—ever placed before the House, in terms or in substance? Did any member, the most abhorrent of the measure, ever dream of propounding such questions for the decision of the House? And yet such would, and ought to have been the case, if any had imagined this House had a voice in affirming or rejecting a treaty, or a control over the President and Senate in making one. But it happened that something was wanted, not to consummate the validity of this treaty, or give it a legal existence, and a binding force, but to carry some of its provisions into effect. And what was that something? Not the assent, the confirmation, the fiat of this House, but its money. It is worthy of remark, that the objectionable parts of the treaty were not those that required this money; but its opponents could come at the provisions they disliked, but which required no appropriation of money, only through parts they did not dislike, but which did require such appropriation. Why, then, in this sideway, this indirect assault, did the enemies of that treaty endeavor to overthrow it, or rather those parts of it to which they are hostile, if they had a Constitutional right to make a direct attack upon it; to withhold their confirmation, without which it could have no binding operation; to impose their veto, by which the whole would perish? But, sir, neither the treaty, nor any of its provisions, was ever distinctly before them; no resolution or bill, either to affirm or reject it, was ever propounded or offered to the House. Why did not those gentlemen, with the Constitution in their hands, march boldly up to the attack, and assert directly their right to pass upon a treaty, as such, and to grant or refuse it the force and obligation of a law and a contract? An attempt so extravagant never was made or hinted at; after a struggle of extraordinary pertinacity, at last the House of Representatives did, as I trust they will always do, yielded to their Constitutional duty, and gave the money required. But, sir, to bring the principle now in controversy to a test, suppose that the House had refused the money, would the treaty have been no longer a treaty, or rather did it wait the assent of that House before it became one—before it had the character and obligations of a national compact? Assuredly not; for I fear no contradiction when I assert, that if the House had so refused, and the President could have procured competent persons to perform the duties of the commissioners, to be appointed under the treaty, and for whose compensation the money was wanted, without compensation, he might have done so. He ought to have gone on to execute and fulfil the stipulations of the treaty, and the whole would have been binding on us all, as the “supreme law of the land.” Will any gentleman deny this; and, if admitted, does it not decide the question—I mean the general right of the President and Senate to make a treaty, uncontrolled by the power of this House? And if a treaty be well made and fully consummated, under the authority of the President and Senate, it becomes, by the express words of the Constitution, the supreme law of the land; and, being the law, it must necessarily have the most obvious and essential effect of a law; that is, to repeal or renew all prior laws inconsistent with it. The last declaration of the will of the nation, if properly made, must, by an obvious necessity, abrogate a former declaration in contradiction to it; and thus, to return to the question originally proposed for discussion—a treaty, constitutionally made, may repeal a prior law also constitutionally made. To say it is a law, but that it has no power to repeal a law, is to deny it the first and most essential principle and quality of a law; is, in truth, a contradiction in terms utterly irreconcilable and incomprehensible.

But gentlemen had labored their ingenuity and inflamed their imagination, to suppose a variety of extreme cases, in which the President and Senate might possibly make treaties, destructive of the first rights and interests of the country. They might make a treaty which would impose a different rate of excise or impost on different parts of the United States, although the Constitution declares they shall be uniform; or imposing a duty on exports; or ceding a part of the territory of the United States; and in order to give the last supposed case a most formidable aspect, a whole State—the State of South Carolina—has been supposed to be the victim of this Executive power. And it is asked, shall not the House of Representatives, in such cases, avert the tremendous mischief, by refusing to ratify the treaty, and making it void? I answer, unhesitatingly, no; nor is it necessary they should. I recur to my first proposition; this House can neither make nor add to the obligation of a good treaty, or annul a bad one. In the cases put the treaty is void, ab initio, by the force of the Constitution; or, to speak more properly, it never was a treaty, and therefore cannot be annulled. A contract of this sort attempted to be made is not binding on the nation, and never was so for an instant. But it is not the power of this House by which it is overthrown; but by that great original power, the Constitution, which has given bounds to the treaty-makers as well as to this House; and when either pass over those bounds, whatever is done is a mere nullity. In a case like this, the assent of this House, uniting with the act of the President and Senate, the whole combined could not give the act a binding force on the people, whose delegated authority has been transcended. This House, then, is equally powerless, either to raise up or destroy a treaty contrary to the express provisions of the Constitution—and here, it will be seen, I differ from some of the honorable gentlemen who join me in opposing the bill; I cannot consider the treaty-makers as universal and omnipotent as they do. No part of the territory of Pennsylvania can be granted from her by the treaty-making power, or any other power in the United States. An absolute dominion of the soil is the first and most essential right of sovereignty, and with this the States have never parted in their grant to the United States. When we cannot make a law to regulate the course of descents of real estate in the several States, or to direct the mode and form of making conveyances, will it be pretended we can bargain away the soil itself? Besides, what becomes of the guarantee of a republican form of government to every State, if any one of them may be ceded and delivered over to an Emperor or despot? I need not to detain the House by explaining how a part of the country held by an enemy, by the right of conquest, at the close of the war, and when the preservation of the whole may render a peace indispensable, may introduce other considerations and results; I give no opinion on such a case.

An honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. SHEFFEY) had said much about the sovereign power of this House. He considers this to be the temple of the sovereignty of the people; that this sovereignty is deposited with us, to be held and wielded at our pleasure only; and as the making of a treaty is an exercise of the sovereign power, he thence infers that it belongs here, or, at least, cannot be exercised without our assent and agency. The error of this reasoning lies in not considering the peculiar nature of our Government; and we are constantly falling into mistakes, by drawing arguments and conclusions from the principles and practice of Governments of a construction so different as to admit no analogy. The sovereign power of the people of America, sir, is not in this House, nor in the President and Senate, nor in all of them combined; it is not in the Government of the United States—it remains in and with the several States, who have delegated and distributed certain portions of it to the General or Federal Government, in the instrument we call the Constitution; and, therefore, when we would decide whether a particular power belongs to this or that branch of the General Government, we must not deduce from general principles, or the nature and attributes of sovereignty, but look to that instrument, in and by which the only sovereign power in this country—the people of the respective States—have declared to whom they have imparted and intrusted the particular power in question. Let us, then, lay aside the empty boast of sovereignty, and be content to take our station as appointed by the Constitution, and use the powers there given. As to all the cases of supposed possible treaties which have been put and multiplied upon us in the course of this discussion, violating the express stipulations of the Constitution, and overthrowing the primary, essential rights of the people, I repeat, that we need not fear them, nor look to the patriotism of this House for protection against them; we have a better, a sure protection in the Constitution, which strangles such an effort even in its birth, and requires no aid from this House in performing the work.

I regret, sir, that so much of the argument in support of this bill has been directly and avowedly founded on suspicions and jealousies of the power of the Senate. The basis of every Government, of ours most especially, nay, of all the dealings and transactions of men, is a fair and honorable confidence in each other. Without this, neither the public nor private business can go along for a moment; if distrust is to be the order of the day, if we are to fear treachery and ambuscade at every step, the consequence is that we must stand still. I find, sir, it is a favorite sentiment with some gentlemen who have spoken on this occasion, that this House may claim a superiority of trust and confidence over the Senate on account of our closer proximity to the people. It is true, we are the last birth of the sovereign will, but some few months old, and the Senate is a stout boy of six years. We may, indeed, be the pet of the mother, as the last and most spoiled child usually is, especially if she have a little caprice in her temper, which cannot be denied to ours. But, sir, I am far from believing that the experience of the Senate is any disadvantage to their wisdom; or that they feel themselves so elevated as no longer to respect or regard the source of all their power and importance. I have no such apprehensions of them; but, if I had, may I interpose my fears between them and their Constitutional rights? Shall I blast their powers with any suspicions? "Beware of jealousy." If the time shall ever come when the different branches of this Government shall cease to have a just and honorable confidence in each other; when they shall cease to know that they emanate from the same power; are created by the same breath; when they shall cease to feel that they represent the same interests; are bound by the same duties, and are responsible to the same authority, then is the day of confusion and calamity come upon us; and in the unrighteous struggle all legitimate power will be lost. But "there is no such thing." Such suggestions are made here to point an argument or turn a phrase, but no man seriously fears or believes them. A gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. ROBERTSON) has said that, with the Senate and President claiming to repeal laws by treaties on the one hand, and the judiciary to declare them unconstitutional on the other, the power of this House is reduced to nothing. We are, says he, trenched on all sides, and can move and act in no direction. True, sir, we have our limits, our measured bounds, beyond which we may not move or act. But the gentleman is in an error in ascribing the restraint either to the President and Senate on the one side, or the judiciary on the other. It is the Constitution in both, that encumbers both us and them. They are but the organs, the instruments declaring and enforcing the high commands, the sovereign will of the people, as manifested and declared in the Constitution; they are sworn to do this, and this they must do, whomsoever they may offend. If this House overstep the prescribed bounds, it is the duty of the judiciary to call it back; or, at least, in administering the law to the citizen, to execute that law which is supreme, rather than that which is subordinate and limited, when they come in conflict. Is the judge, who passes the sentence of the law on a convicted culprit, guilty of murder; or is he guilty of usurpation, when he passes the sentence of the Constitution, on an unconstitutional law? Are the President and Senate to be charged with usurpation, in obeying the mandates of the Constitution, and executing its trusts and powers? No, sir, in both cases they are but the organs, and not the makers of the law; the instruments, not the source of the power.

If we look to the convention itself, what do we find there as to the authority which is necessary to consummate its obligations, and give them a binding force on the people of the United States. In the fifth article it is expressly and unequivocally declared, that "this convention, when the same shall have been duly ratified by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and by His Britannic Majesty, and the respective ratifications mutually exchanged, shall be binding and obligatory on the said United States and His Majesty for four years from the date of its signature; and the ratifications shall be exchanged in six months from this time, or sooner, if possible." Now, all this has been fully and duly done. The President and Senate have ratified the act, and the ratifications have been mutually exchanged, and doubtless the agent of the British Government has transmitted to his Court our ratification as the consummation of the contract; and yet, after all this, we are told that the assent of this House is still required to give force and effect to the convention, and make it binding on the United States. What a solemn mockery have we been practising; what a deliberate deception have we passed upon the other contracting Power! Mr. Speaker, I see your honorable name to this instrument, and to this article. You, sir, have personally and officially assured the British Commissioners that the compact you made with them should be binding on your country, if ratified by the President and Senate. Had you at that time a mental reservation, a concealed proviso in favor of the controlling power of this House over the deed; did you believe and conceal from them that the sanction of this House was also requisite? No, sir, I am sure you did not; you told them explicitly, and you told them truly, that when your act should be confirmed by the President and Senate, it would be the law of our land, binding on the United States. The British Commissioners knew they were negotiating with the most distinguished citizens of their country, whose public situation had peculiarly qualified them to know, what indeed every citizen should know, the Constitution of their own Government. What will be their surprise, then, to learn that our three Commissioners were either unacquainted with the law of their country on the very business they were transacting, or that, knowing it, they had concealed or omitted to disclose a highly important circumstance in relation to the authority under which they acted; nay, that they have actually signed an article which, by every rule of fair and candid construction, negatives the existence of that circumstance; negatives the idea that the sanction of this House must be added to that of the President and Senate to give a binding force to this inchoate compact. Why, sir, did you not tell those gentlemen, fairly and openly, that you had at home a certain body, called the House of Representatives, very jealous of all power but its own, whose good will must also be conciliated in the business, and without whose approbation the convention could never live in our atmosphere? It was because it never entered your mind that any such approbation was or could be necessary. Such an idea did not ever pass in your dreams; besides, you have undertaken that the "ratifications shall be exchanged in six months, or sooner." How could you do this, if you thought this House was to act on them; when the usual term of meeting would not arrive for four months after the date of the instrument, and you could not say how long we might choose to debate about it. For the President and Senate, such an agreement might be safely made.

The honorable gentleman from Georgia (Mr. FORSYTH) has drawn an argument from the Message of the President, which accompanied the convention, in support of the bill in question. To my mind, this message furnishes a result directly contrary, at least so far as to show that the President considers no law from us necessary to give validity to the treaty. What does he say? "I lay before Congress"—what? The convention for their consideration and approbation? No; but "copies of a proclamation notifying the convention concluded," &c., "and that the same has been duly ratified;" that is, having by a proclamation previously given notice to our citizens and the world, of the convention that had been duly concluded and duly ratified, he pays us the compliment of giving us a sort of special notice of the fact, by laying before us copies of the same proclamation he had previously laid before the public. He then recommends such legislative provisions as the convention may (not does) call for on the part of the United States. That is, there may be some matters of debate in your custom-houses or elsewhere; it may be, you will choose to equalize the duties, either by raising both to the British standard, or lowering both to the American, and upon such matters exercise your discretion. But surely this is a very different thing from requiring or expecting of us to re-enact the whole convention in the form of a law, in order to give it a binding force on the United States. Now, assuredly, so far as we may respect the personal authority of any man on this question, there is no one more entitled to consideration than the high personage alluded to. He was a distinguished agent in making the Constitution; and afterwards a distinguished champion in defending and expounding it, both by his eloquence and his pen; and we may and ought to place much confidence in his constructions of its intent and meaning.

The friends of this bill rest their argument, almost wholly, on the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution, in which the powers of Congress are specially enumerated, among which we find the power to "regulate commerce with foreign nations," expressly granted. Now there is surely nothing unwise, or inexpedient, or inconsistent, in giving this general power to Congress; and afterwards granting to another branch of the Government the special right to regulate commerce in a given special case, that is, in the case of a treaty or compact with another nation on this subject. And here I would admit and apply the rule of construction given us by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. SHERREY,) that is, that the special power must always be an exception from a limitation of the general power, which is the only means by which both can have operation and effect. But, sir, it seems to me a very essential error has been indulged in this part of the argument. It has been asserted that this section of the Constitution was intended to delineate and prescribe the powers of Congress, that is, of the general legislative power, in contradistinction to the executive or judicial power, or to mark the boundaries between the different branches of the General Government. Nothing can be more mistaken. The sole object is, to mark and establish the line or boundary between the General or Federal Government, and the State governments. The word Congress is not here used in its strict Constitutional meaning, but rather as designating the federal power. This is obvious from the least attention to the subject. By the first section of the first article, the Congress of the United States is declared to consist of the Senate and House of Representatives. If, then, in the eighth section, the term Congress is to be taken in its strict Constitutional sense, it would follow that the Senate and House of Representatives have, without recourse to any other authority, the power to lay and collect taxes, borrow money, regulate commerce, &c., when in fact we know that they have not this power without the assent of the President, unless indeed by two-thirds of each body. This is sufficient to show the danger of fastening our eyes upon any one clause or page of the Constitution to decide its meaning, and the propriety of taking the whole together in order to fix the construction of any part.

We find in this eighth section that Congress may exercise the powers there enumerated, but we find in another place, that the President must concur, and we must take both together as the law of the Constitution. So, in this eighth section we find that Congress has the power to regulate commerce; but in another place we also find a power given to the President and Senate to make treaties, which from their very nature must in many and most instances have relation to commerce, and of consequence so far a power is also given to the President and Senate to regulate commerce. It must be remarked, that in the grant to Congress there are no exclusive words from which it may be inferred, that in no case any other branch of the Government shall interfere with the regulation of commerce; and this answers the question so frequently put to us in the course of this debate, why may not a treaty draw money directly from the Treasury, which is a right given to Congress in the same section which grants the right to regulate commerce. The phraseology is wholly different in the two cases. In case of money, it is declared that "no money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in consequence of appropriations made by law."

We have urged the undisputed case of a treaty of peace repealing a law declaring war; to which no satisfactory explanation or answer has been made. The honorable gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. LOWMYER) has attempted one, which is utterly insufficient, and founded on the most palpable error. He says this is all right, because the power of making peace is not among the enumerated powers of Congress. Why, by the same reasoning, then, we may by this treaty remove the discriminating duties, for the taking off a duty is also not among the enumerated powers of Congress. But the right of removing flows necessarily from the right of imposing a duty; and so the right of making peace would flow from the right of making war, were it not for another reason. The Convention intended to confer on Congress, meaning as I contend in this place, the Federal Government, the power to do those things which a Government may and can do of itself, by its own single authority, and without any dependence upon, or reference to, the will of another nation. Of this sort is every enumerated power. But to make peace, requires the concurrence of the nation with whom you are at war; and is necessarily a subject of negotiation, of treaty, of compact, and not of legislation. It would have been little less than an absurdity for the Convention to have said that the Congress, or any other department of the Government, should have power to make peace. It does not pretend to confer this power on the President and Senate; but merely authorizes them to make treaties, which treaties may obtain peace.

I will offer, sir, one further remark, and then detain you no longer. By the sixth article of the Constitution, it is declared that "this Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land." Here we see three classifications of this supreme law; not three grades, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. ROSS) has remarked, for I cannot comprehend any grades of supremacy. We have three classes, all put on the same footing of authority; and treaties are declared to be as much the supreme law of the land, as laws made in pursuance of the Constitution. Now, the third classification, to wit, "treaties made under the authority of the United States," would be wholly superfluous and unnecessary, on the construction contended for by our opponents; for if a treaty becomes a law of the land, and derives its binding force and effect, not from its own intrinsic power, but by and under the authority of a law of Congress, then are treaties included in the second classification of supreme laws, to wit, "laws made in pursuance of the Constitution," and it was worse than nugatory to say anything more about them. It has, however, been contended that the treaty must be made "under the authority of the United States;" and assumed that this can only be done by the Congress of the United States, in which that authority resides. It is obvious that this argument, or rather assertion, takes for granted the whole matter of dispute; and should, therefore, be proved before it is so much relied on. But is not a treaty made "under the authority of the United States," if it be made by the department of the Government in which the Constitution of the United States has confided the power to make treaties? The authority of the United States is in the Constitution, to be used and exercised according to the distribution there made of it, and every branch acting in its proper sphere acts with the whole authority of the United States. It should also be observed that this clause of the Constitution relates to treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, meaning perhaps to include any treaties or conventions which might have been made, at any period, by any of the individual States.

I am so grateful for the indulgent attention of the House, at this late hour, that I will detain them no longer with thanks and apologies.

When Mr. H. had concluded, the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, January 13.

Mr. WENDOVER presented petitions of sundry inhabitants of the United States, praying Congress to take into consideration the present situation of the cotton manufactories of the country, and enact such laws and regulations as may be deemed expedient for the interests of those concerned therein, as well as for the interest of the public in general.—Referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. PORTER presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the county of Niagara, in the State of New York, praying compensation for losses occasioned by the invasion of that frontier by the British forces, during the late war, in which invasion the villages of Buffalo, Black Rock, Manchester, and Lewiston, were totally destroyed.—Referred to MESSRS. PORTER, THROOP, BASSETT, HERBERT, CHIPMAN, WILKIN, and MURFREE.

Mr. SAVAGE presented a petition of Thomas Williams, lately one of the chiefs of Iroquois tribe of Indians, in the dominions of Great Britain, but now a resident of the State of New York, praying remuneration for losses sustained by him in consequence of his abandoning the British dominions and joining the American forces, during the late war with Great Britain.—Referred to the Secretary of War.

Mr. YANCEY, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of John G. Camp, which was read; when Mr. Y. reported a bill for the relief of John G. Camp; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. PORTER, the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims were instructed to inquire into the expediency of placing the following officers and private soldiers of the

New York militia on the pension list, on the ground of wounds and disabilities received while in the service of the United States, namely: Captain John Huie, Sergeant John Maxon; privates, Ptolemy Sheldon, John B. Williams, Erastus Disbrow, Jabez Fisk, and Jonathan D. Carrier.

Mr. P. also presented sundry documents in support of the claims to pensions of the officers and soldiers named in the foregoing resolution, which were referred to the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. INGHAM, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill to amend an act, entitled "An act for the relief of Edward Hallowell;" which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LAW, from a select committee, reported a bill for the relief of Jonathan Rogers, junior, of Waterford, in the State of Connecticut; which was read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

COMMERCE WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

The House resumed the consideration of the question depending yesterday at the time of the adjournment, to wit: Shall the engrossed bill "to regulate the commerce between the territories of the United States and of His Britannic Majesty, according to the convention concluded on the 3d day of July, 1815," pass?

Mr. FORSYTH rose and spoke as follows: I am extremely reluctant, Mr. Speaker, to protract the decision of this question; and if I believed the few observations I propose to make would delay it beyond the present day, I should certainly remain silent, notwithstanding the strong inducements I have to address you. My purpose is to vindicate the bill before you, and its advocates, from charges which have been repeated by almost every gentleman who has pretended to examine the principles of the one or the motives of the other.

The bill has been represented as contradicting and belying all the doctrines heretofore established on this subject; as a dangerous and unprecedented novelty; as assuming for its basis a principle that legislative aid is necessary to the validity of all treaties which can be made by the Constitutional authority. Is it necessary for me again to refer to the laws heretofore passed in the execution of treaties to prove how utterly unfounded is the first accusation? Will the honorable gentlemen who have in such forcible terms condemned the introduction of this novelty turn over the statute book and examine with accuracy the provisions made for the execution of the treaties of Great Britain,* Spain, and France? Sir,

* In a former address to the House on this subject, Mr. Forsyth was under the impression that no laws had been passed, or were necessary, in execution of the Treaty of 1794. A subsequent examination of that treaty, and of the acts of Congress, has enabled him to correct this mistake. It was agreed by the third article of the treaty, that merchandise imported into the United States from the British territories in North America, by land or inland navigation, should be subject to no they will find that the statutes passed in the execution of these instruments are twin brothers, echoes, reflected images. However they may be disposed to condemn this useless legislation, it will be necessary to found their condemnation upon something more substantial than a vague declamation against novelties, precedents for which are to be found in every treaty made since the establishment of the Government of the United States.

The basis of the bill is not the principle stated, that legislative aid is necessary to the validity of treaties. Gentlemen have exhausted their ingenuity, their time, and their eloquence, in the discussion of a doctrine utterly denied by the bill and those who advocate it. The doctrine contended for is, that in certain cases specified by the Constitution, legislative aid is necessary to the execution of treaties. Is there no difference between the two propositions? On the contrary, is not the distinction apparent to the eye and obvious to the touch? The distinction between the validity of an instrument and the execution of its provisions, between the obligation of contract and the performance of that obligation? We are not disposed to call in question the propriety of this name which has been given to this instrument, or to baptize it by any other than that which it properly derives from its godfather and godmother, the President and the Senate; we insist not that it is the figment or shadow of a treaty, but that it shall be neither more nor less than a treaty, valid and obligatory as such as a contract, but not having the force of law in its operation upon the municipal concerns of this people without legislative enactment. And where, sir, is the danger to arise; not from the establishment, but from the continuance of this Constituhigher duties than would be payable if imported in American vessels into the Atlantic ports of the said States. A provision perfectly similar, so far as respected the intercourse by land with Canada, to that introduced in the late convention, with respect to the intercourse with the European British territories, and which was equally inconsistent with the existing revenue laws, which then as now imposed an additional duty of ten per cent. on the duty imposed on merchandise imported in American vessels. When the importation was made in foreign vessels, the same article contained also several other provisions, either inconsistent with the existing laws, or embracing objects within the sphere of the legislative powers of Congress—such as the exemption of duty on peltries, on goods belonging to the Indians, and on merchandise carried over the portages; the regulation of the rates of tonnage; the general permission to import all goods not altogether prohibited, &c. The Western posts were not delivered up until 1797, and it was only in 1799 that revenue districts and custom-houses were established by law on Lakes Ontario, Erie, and Huron. The same act which established those, “the act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage, passed the 2d of March, 1799,” contains several sections enacted for the purpose of conforming the act to the stipulations of the treaty above mentioned; those sections are the 104th and 105th, (4th vol. Laws of the United States, pages 440 and 441,) and embrace all the provisions of the third article alluded to.

tional practice? Can it be supposed that it will be necessary, convenient, or proper, for the President and Senate to make treaties, to the execution of which Congress will refuse its aid? Can it be expected, after the national faith has been pledged by the competent authority, that any department of the Government will refuse to do the acts necessary for the redemption of the pledge? May not the same causes which operated to produce the acquiescence of the President, and the recommendation of two-thirds of the Senate, be at all times trusted to procure a bare majority of this branch of Congress for the fulfilment of its part of the national obligation? Every treaty ratified imposes upon the Government, in all its departments, the obligation to fulfil it. The extent of that obligation is a question not now necessary to be examined or discussed. So far as relates to the late convention with Great Britain, no disposition is felt in any part of the House to avoid the discharge of all the duties which are imposed by its ratification. The advocates of this doctrine have been accused of a desire to encroach upon the Constitutional power of the other body. This House has been called the pet child of an over-indulgent mother, and warned not to assume rights, presuming upon that indulgence, which are exclusively vested in another child of the same family. The propriety of this warning is to be tested by the truth of the principle it assumes, that the legislative right is vested in the other and less favored child. How far the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. HOPKINSON) has succeeded in establishing this truth the House will judge. I beg leave, however, to remind him, that in the execution of this duty he proposed one question and argued a different one. The question whether a treaty subsequently made, repeals an existing law contrary to its stipulations, was the one proposed to be considered, and the one now before the House. This is to be determined by what the Constitution is, and not what it ought to be. This was the groundwork of his argument; but instead of raising it upon this basis, he abandons it at the first stroke of his trowel, and builds his whole superstructure upon a distinct and undisputed foundation: that there is no supposable case in which the vote of this House is necessary to give validity to a treaty. Sir, we are in the exercise of our Constitutional powers, and performing the duties of our station, in opposing principles never before contended for; ruinous in their consequences to the security of public happiness, destructive of the ends of the Constitution. We are the guardians of the rights of the people, placed as sentinels to watch the avenues of power, to prevent the encroachments of all the other departments of the Government, and to scan with inquisitorial scrutiny the motives which govern their conduct. In all the discussions and warmth which has heretofore been excited by the supposed conflict between the powers of the two Houses, an attempt never was before made to prevent the passage of an act to carry a treaty into effect, on the ground that the treaty itself becomes a law, notwithstanding the existence of a contradictory statute. The uniform practice, and the doctrines heretofore held, are equally in contradiction to this novel and unprecedented attempt.

In the long, animated, and lucid discussion of the treaty-making power in the year 1796, it was contended by the Federal minority, 1st. That a treaty once ratified was binding on the nation, and that Congress was as much bound to pass the laws necessary to carry such treaty into effect, as the President and Courts were to execute its provisions; 2dly. That if there was any discretion in Congress, it was limited to the special act required of them—to the propriety of making appropriations, of regulating duties, &c., and that they had no right to take into consideration, as a motive of dissent, other parts of the treaty which avowedly required no legislative sanction. The determination of the Representatives of the people at that period—I mean the Republican majority—was still more clearly contradictory to this new doctrine. Upon what, sir, is the reliance for its establishment at this late day? Literally upon a marginal note of the printer of the Constitution, which says treaties are laws of the land. I will not repeat what I had already occasion to remark, and what has been so much more fully illustrated by other gentlemen, that the text of this part of the Constitution has no bearing upon this question, it was adopted for a purpose explained sufficiently by reference to the article itself, to ascertain the supremacy of the Constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States over State constitutions and State laws. Is reliance placed upon the article which authorizes the President, by and with the advice and consent of two-thirds of the Senate, to make treaties? The making the contract, and the effect of it, are totally different things. The ascertainment of what department of the Government is authorized to make treaties, does nothing towards the establishment of the doubtful question of the extent and effect of them when made. It is upon the article which extends the judicial power to all cases in law and equity arising under the Government and laws of the United States, and the treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority. This is not sufficient, for this provision is necessary to the perfection of the Constitution, whether treaties are of themselves sufficient or require legislative enactment. Cases would arise under treaties which avowedly require no legislative provision, and to those cases it was necessary to extend the judicial power of the General Government. These are all the clauses of the Constitution on the subject, and not one of them separated from the residue authorizes the conclusion which had been drawn from them. Nor is this conclusion justified by any possible combination or analysis of them. An attempt, however, is made to supply this defect in the letter of the Constitution, by a course of reasoning upon the nature of treaties and the necessity which exists for giving such a construction in order to perfect the grant of power to the President and Senate, to enable the Executive to exercise it in such a manner as to produce the end intended to be accomplished by the grant. It is said, also, that a treaty being a contract between nations, operating upon the parties to it, is superior to a law which operates only upon the citizens or subjects of either of the parties. I deny the correctness of the data and the arguments founded upon them. It is necessary from the nature of the treaty power that its object should not be defined, but the necessity of limiting the effect of the exercise of the power is the same, is indeed infinitely greater than the necessity of limiting the exercise of legislative power, the more especially in a Government constituted like ours, where the legislative power is bridled by its division into separate branches. Unless, indeed, it should be shown that there is greater danger to be apprehended from the combination and corruption of two bodies dissimilarly constituted in the same State, than from the corruption of one of them, and its combination with a foreign Power—a position, whose falsehood is demonstrated both by theory and experience. What is the end to be accomplished? The preservation of the national faith by a faithful discharge of the contract. Is the mode of fulfilling it important to this end? Is not the national faith sacredly complied with, either by the enactment of laws in execution of the treaty, or by considering the treaty as law in itself? It is true, sir, that it is more convenient for those who exercise this power that it should not be thus clogged, the more especially if it is sought to be exerted in doubtful or desperate cases; but the foreign Government with whom your engagement is formed, has no more concern with the manner in which it is to be executed than with any other internal regulation. It is, however, said to be all-powerful, because it is a contract. This, permit me to say, is the first time I have heard the doctrine advanced that a law which commands is inferior to a contract which promises; that the act of performance is inferior to the word of promise. The very contrary is the doctrine I hold; the law is superior because the treaty is but the promise, the contract, which can be redeemed or fulfilled only by subsequent enactment. The inferiority of the treaty to the legislative power is obvious from the nature of the two powers and the manner in which they are to operate; the first is granted from necessity, the second for convenience; the first is essential to the existence of society, the second adventitious; the first operates within the State, the latter is granted from its possible connexion with, and effect upon, the objects for which the first was delegated. But, sir, the effect resulting from the establishment of this monstrous pretension, requires to be examined. The people who framed the Constitution imagined that they had secured all their rights from violation by the checks and guards. They believed at least that no laws could be passed without the consent of their Representatives biennially responsible to them for the wisdom and purity of their conduct.

In order to preserve within its proper sphere the Congress of which these Representatives were a constituent part, they fixed certain boundaries within which they should be permitted freely to act, and within which they fondly imagined no other authority could be permitted to interfere with the exercise of their powers. Inadvertently, however, they have authorized the President and Senate to make treaties, and this general permission is made the instrument of wresting from their Representatives their share in the management of the national interest. A foreign Power or Indian tribe is substituted for the Representatives of the people, and the President and Senate with this extra Constitutional assistance is omnipotent; their word is good against the world. They may lay taxes, borrow money, regulate commerce, establish uniform rules of bankruptcy, coin money, declare war, raise armies, and change your Constitution ad libitum. We are told that these are extreme cases, not to be supposed; the Senate are too pure to act thus; that the Constitution limits their power by declaring that no money shall be taken from the Treasury except by appropriations previously made by law; and some have adopted the ground that the power of the purse and the sword is with the Congress, and cannot be affected by treaty. We are informed, too, that it is not a fair mode of reasoning, to put extreme cases. Doubtful principles are always to be tested by considering the consequences deducible from them. If they are fairly deduced, and are manifestly absurd, however apparently correct the premises may be, however difficult to detect their fallacy, we may conclude with unerring certainty that they are false. In this case gentlemen refuse to examine because they dare not face the consequences of the principles they recommend. If there is anything in their argument of the purity and wisdom of the Senate, the argument is equally applicable to ourselves, and we and those who succeed us, I hope, may be as safely trusted as the present or any other Senate which may assist in the management of the national concerns. Admitting the present purity and wisdom of the Senate, have you a bond that they are to remain so? It will be remembered that the descendants of the Senators who died on their chairs when Rome was sacked by the Goths, were the vilest parasites and panderers of imperial power. What is the boasted restriction imposed by the section that "no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law?" It is true that most important acts of power require the expenditure of money. Many, however deadly to the public interest and security, may be effected without its aid.

An honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. HOPKINSON) who warned us "to beware of jealousy," has shown us how easily this section may be evaded. He has told us that a treaty may be carried into execution without appropriations, if the President can procure the required service to be performed without compensation. From this it follows, as an irresistible corollary, that, if the money necessary can be procured in any other way, the treaty may be executed. If, for example, the foreign Power should prefer to pay the money rather than lose the advantages of the contract. This position, taken in connexion with his solemn warning, like the conduct and the voice of Iago, is calculated to awaken and stimulate that passion against whose influence he bids us "beware." But whence arises this squeamish distinction between appropriation laws and other laws? Is a treaty a law to some purposes and not a law for others? From what source is this distinction drawn? Why will gentlemen after swallowing the hemlock refuse the necessary means to give it immediate effect? Can they hope to escape the deadly influence of the poisonous draught? They indeed prolong for a short period a miserable existence; they may render the mortal agony more intense by protracting the moment of dissolution; but, sir, their fate is sealed, and no human power can sever them from death. What is the efficacy of this limitation, supposing it to be beyond evasion and dispute? What is its potent efficacy, if, by your President and Senate, a band of five hundred thousand armed banditti are admitted into the centre of your territory? Constitutional limitations, without any power of enforcement but the people, neither forewarned nor forearmed by their representatives, (for, if our aid is not necessary, the first intimation we may have will be the landing of these hordes upon our shores,)—what are they against fixed bayonets and ruthless ambition? It is in vain to say this will not, cannot happen. Sir, I know it cannot, will not happen, if we are true to our own trust; but if this unlimited authority is granted to the President and Senate, who will say that in the next century it may not occur? The honorable advocates of this doctrine rely for the fidelity of the execution of the power upon the mode of selecting the Senators, upon their honorable desire to live in history, to be recorded to after times as virtuous and patriotic—upon the omnipotent influence of public opinion. I am not disposed to call in question the correctness of the mode of selection adopted by the Constitution, but if this is the only safeguard, Heaven help us, for we are beyond the reach of earthly assistance. Let any man who believes in the unerring wisdom which has been exhibited in the choice of Senators, enter the Senate House at any period since the establishment of the Government; he would have found intelligence, virtue, and patriotism, but he would have found also, by their side, stupidity, vice, and selfishness. Brawling ignorance has more than once occupied the chair which ought to have been filled by unassuming merit; and sacrifices have been offered on the altars of treason, erected in the very centre of the Senate Chamber. Will it be insisted that these, at present partial evils, may not become, in the gradual progress of society, universal corruption? That the body at present visited by occasional blotches may not hereafter be covered with leprosy, against whose contagion the Constitution intended to guard? If this is not sufficient, how much more inefficient is the confidence reposed in their desire to live recorded for their virtues in after times. History has been justly styled the record of human turpitude, and he who wishes to occupy a conspicuous place on the roll, will most surely succeed if his life is distinguished by successful villainy. To be virtuous, to perform with fidelity the duties of life, to be honest and incorruptible in private and in public stations, will secure to the man his portion of happiness in this life, and a reward in that to come; but to acquire that species of immortality which is conferred by the pen of the historian, he must possess very different qualities, and exercise them for very different purposes. It is, indeed, the fortunate lot of some individuals to be conspicuous in their opposition to the crimes of others, but they owe their place in the temple of history to the criminality of their opponents. The name of WASHINGTON never would have survived the first century after his death but for the oppressions of England, and the consequent Revolutionary contest. William Tell would have died unnoticed and unknown, an humble and virtuous peasant of the canton of Uri, but for the villainy of Gesler, and the ambition of Austria. Public opinion, then, is to be the efficient guard. And what is it? In the pursuit of our duty virtue teaches us to disregard it. Of its influence, corruption renders us insensible. Admitting it to be thus omnipotent upon unsuccessful crime—for history teaches us that the failure or success of a project but too often fixes its character—how does it operate? Not on the crime, but on the criminal; it permits him to perfect the injury, but visits him afterwards with its punishment. The Constitution knows no such guards. It was framed with a view, if I may adopt the phrase, to preventive, not vindictive justice. It intended to prevent the commission of the offence, not to punish the criminal.

I will not occupy your time by an examination of the strange doctrine that the power of the purse and sword being with us, the treaty-making power is sufficiently limited. This, if it does anything, gives up the whole ground. The power over the sword, to make war, depends upon the same terms as the power to regulate commerce, and all the other powers granted to Congress. No man whose head is not strangely confused, or whose forehead is not covered with Corinthian brass, can pretend to make a distinction between them. If one is exclusive, so are the rest.

I have said, Mr. Speaker, that the President and Senate may alter your Constitution by treaty if these doctrines are correct. The Constitution provides that amendments may be made by two-thirds of the State Legislatures, and two-thirds of the Congress. It says, in the clause already mentioned, that commerce may be regulated, and money coined, and war made by Congress. If, then, the treaty-making power is paramount to the power of Congress, is it not paramount to the authority of Congress and the States?

If a foreign Government can be substituted in the place of the Representatives of the people, what forbids the same substitution in the place of Congress and the States? The same argument applicable to the first set of powers is applicable to the last. It will not, I presume, be contended, in these days of modern improvement in the law of nations, that a foreign Power cannot by treaty make any regulations in the Government of a neighboring State or people. I would, before I conclude, bring to the recollection of the House an argument urged by a gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. SHEFFERY,) and the answer given to it by a gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. HOPKINSON.) It was this: That the powers given to Congress are definite in their terms, and appropriate to their objects, while the power given to the President and Senate to make treaties is given in general and unrestricted terms. It was asked, and as I shall show no satisfactory answer was given to the question, by what rule of construction a power primarily and specially given to a body can be assumed and exercised by another to which, in a subsequent clause, a mere general authority is given. Upon every acknowledged principle of construction the specific power would clearly, in such case, be deemed a reservation and exception out of the general grant. In answer, what was urged? Not that the conclusion was incorrect; not that the principle was false; but its force was evaded by what I must call a sophism, and that not distinguished by its ingenuity. The answer was, that the Constitution gives to Congress a general power over commerce, but to the President and Senate a special power over commerce.

From a general grant, broad and undefined as it could be made, a power to make treaties a special power to regulate commerce, is deduced by argument. This special power, depending upon the correctness of the deduction, is made an exception out of the specific grant of power to Congress, of legislating exclusively upon the same subject. Thus a special power, derived by argument from a general grant, is made to destroy a special power expressly granted. Such, sir, are the resources to which one of the ablest of the supporters of this new doctrine is driven in its defence.

The same gentleman sought to rest the claim of the power of the Senate upon the notion, that the powers of Congress and the treaty-making power were concurrent. This idea, admitting it to be correct, does not obviate the difficulty. If these powers are exercised upon the same objects to produce the same effects, there is no contradiction or difficulty; but if they operate in opposite directions, which is paramount, which is inferior? The vexed question necessarily recurs. It has been suggested, that the one last exercised is to prevail, inasmuch as the last act always repeals the preceding act. This suggestion is not entitled to the weight which has been given to it. It rests upon a fallacy easily detected. It proceeds upon another proposition, that the last exertion of the same authority is superior to, and sets aside the former act. Here, however, the act of one power constitutionally exerted, is repealed by the act of another differently constituted. This position is attempted to be enforced by another still more refined and indefensible: That Congress have ordinary, and the President and Senate extraordinary, legislative powers; the one proceeding by acts, and the other by treaties. I do not understand how gentlemen obviate the difficulty thrown in their way by the first article of the Constitution, which declares, that all legislative powers herein granted, shall be vested in a Congress of the United States. Not all ordinary, but all legislative power shall be exercised by Congress. Where, then, is the part of the Constitution which contains this extraordinary grant of extraordinary legislation?

Sir, what an extraordinary spectacle our Government would exhibit to the world, if these positions are true. To-day the President and Senate, without our assistance, can do nothing affecting the happiness or security of this people. In a matter highly interesting and important, deeply affecting the national interest—the national honor—the President and Senate, in their legislative capacity, are desirous a particular system should be adopted; this House refuses its concurrence—the system necessarily fails. To-morrow a Constitutional juggle is played off, and the system is fixed eternally upon us. A foreign Government or Indian tribe makes a contract or treaty (the terms are convertible) with the President; he sends it by his Secretary to the Senate; the doors are closed; the Eleusinian mysteries are celebrated; and, after the requisite sacrifices in the temple of secrecy, the contract is ushered into the world. To borrow the metaphorical language of the gentleman from Maryland, it starts into life the supreme law of the land; either establishing a new system obnoxious to, and rejected by, the Representatives of the people, or overturning all the systems heretofore established with their concurrence. The Constitution of the United States, so much the object of our admiration, and the praise of other nations, does not deserve the eulogiums bestowed upon it, if such practices are consistent with its principles. At one moment the Senate is but a co-equal and co-ordinate branch of the legislative authority; at the next its will is supreme and irresistible. To-day, in the hands of the President, it is powerless as the staff of the Israelite; to-morrow, it is converted, by his assistance, into a serpent, active and devouring, swallowing up everything within the range of the Constitution. To-day it is powerless as a fevered Cæsar, crying “bring me some drink, Tytinius, like a sick girl;” to-morrow it is Cæsar imperial, at “whose nod we must bend our bodies,” with reverence and submission.

Mr. Speaker, I have much more to say on this subject, but the persons in conversation behind me, warn me that I must not continue my remarks, without a contest for the attention of the House. It will not be considered as unpardonable on my part, to abandon a conflict so useless and ungrateful, and to leave them the undisputed masters of the field.

Mr. JACKSON said he regretted that he had consulted his feelings more than his judgment, when he last evening expressed a wish to submit some remarks upon the question before the House; a wish, prompted by the impulse of the moment, after hearing the ingenious argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, which seemed to him to require a reply from those who thought, as Mr. J. did, that this bill was indispensably necessary to carry into effect, with good faith, the provisions of the treaty. Mr. J. remarked, he was the more reluctant now to occupy their time, after the arguments just delivered by his friend from Georgia, (Mr. FORSYTH,) in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania; but as he had given a pledge to the House, he would proceed briefly to redeem it, with the express reservation, that if, in the course of his remarks, any manifestation of impatience occurred, he would instantly terminate them. I differ, said Mr. J., from gentlemen who conceive that the question before us, in consequence of the coincidence of opinion in regard to the treaty, possesses no interest in reality, or in the view of those who are called upon to decide it. It is true, and it is not less fortunate than true, that thus far the discussion has been conducted upon liberal principles, involving only the consideration of what is a just interpretation of the Constitution, without the baneful influence of party animosities; yet it cannot be doubted that the question is really and intrinsically of vast importance, as has been amply developed by this discussion. And I consider the decision which shall be pronounced now, as calculated to fix, perhaps for ages, the interpretation of the Constitution in relation to one of its most important provisions; it will not only try the opinions formerly advanced, by an unerring test, but being given in the same age which gave birth to the Constitution, will possess all the weight of a precedent established almost contemporaneously with the charter. It is now too late to deny the influence of precedents in a free Government. Perhaps, whatever exists of value in the British Constitution is the authority of precedent; an authority so highly esteemed, as to give rise to the legal maxim, that “communis error facit jus,” that it is better to acquiesce in an erroneous interpretation, long settled and become a rule of decision, than that the rights of society should be put at hazard by a disregard of all former opinions by the expounders of the laws and the Constitution.

I regard this as a striking illustration of the idea, that the powers of genius and eloquence are so transcendent as to set all the sober maxims of reason at naught, and by the magic of their influence “make the wrong appear the better reason.” And although I listened with constant attention to the fine specimens we have had of that high prerogative, I will not say I attended with pleasure to the splendid exhibition of talents by the gentlemen on the other side of the question; for in proportion to their strength are their arguments dangerous—hurtful. The wound inflicted by a gilded dagger is oftentimes more mortal than that produced by a leaden bullet. This is the age of reason; and the politician who seeks for fame must address himself to the judgment of the community; he must convince by his arguments, rather than delight by his oratory; and he that gives a wrong bias to public opinion by the display of extraordinary abilities, is more to be dreaded than the man who rails against the principles of the Government, and openly endeavors to subvert it. In all Governments having a written constitution much, very much depends upon its faithful interpretation; and yet, unfortunately, the interpretation which is given almost always partakes of the predilections of those by whom the instrument is expounded. Some good men think that a main defect of our system consists in the inadequacy of the powers of the Executive, and hence, on all questions involving their consideration, they give a construction calculated to increase rather than to restrict them. And to this cause alone do I ascribe it, that we hear doctrines avowed which render all the great powers of legislation a nullity, and which bind the nation hand and foot to the car of the Executive, and the counsellors of the Executive, in the exercise of the treaty-making power.

In order to arrive at a just conclusion, the proper mode is to regard the Constitution as obligatory upon us—to indulge in no speculative theories as to what it ought to be; "ita lex scripta est," and as it is written so let it be expounded. Perhaps it is due to candor that I should state my opinions upon the extent of the Executive power also, in order that the rule I am applying to others may have its proper weight in estimating my arguments; with that view alone, I declare my firm conviction to be, that the Executive authority is already strong enough—it wants not the aids or props of construction; and if the question under discussion were as to the competency of the Executive authority upon a motion to amend the Constitution in that particular, instead of being a question as to its extent merely, I believe it would be decided again that no principle of public liberty required any addition to the grant of power already defined by that instrument.

I say, sir, that the doctrines advocated do annihilate the legislative powers of Congress, and convert us into a mere registering body. Let me state some of the positions advanced, and see if I am not justified in this opinion. It is said—

1st. That the treaty-making power is unrestricted, and exceptions to it are by construction merely.

2d. That it is a complete power independently of the Legislature, and where its fulfilment requires legislative enactments, they are compelled by the treaty to preserve our faith, as the payment of a debt, or the conveyance of land, when stipulated for by a competent authority.

3d. That this treaty requires no further sanction to give it validity.

4th. That it was promulgated by the President as a valid and obligatory instrument, requiring no legislative aid.

5th. That this is not a bill auxiliary to, or giving effect to the treaty, and is therefore useless.

6th. And that the security we have against the abuse of this vast power is in the public opinion, which, it is said, is an ample security.

I will examine each of these propositions in the order now presented.

The first is, that the treaty-making power is unrestricted, &c. Regarding the Constitution as an entire instrument, in which every provision was intended to have effect and harmonize with all the others, and that no superfluous terms or phrases were used by its framers, I perceive a restriction on this power in the grant itself, which relates to treaties, and defines their force when made, viz: The President shall have power to make treaties; "and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law," &c. The term "under," is synonymous here with pursuant to, in obedience, or in conformity with; for if it had been designed to be without limitation, other words, less significant in their meaning, would have been employed—but waiving this suggestion, which may be objected to as a mere criticism, I will say, it is restricted by many prominent provisions of the Constitution, namely: in all the instances where the exercise of a general power is prohibited to the United States, as in the cases enumerated by the 9th section of the 1st article, which declares that no tax shall be laid on exports, &c., and it is restricted also by other provisions, whereby an express power over other specified objects is given to the Congress of the United States; and it is wholly incompatible with the plainest rules of construction, that a power expressly granted, can be annihilated by inference and interpretation merely, which would be the effect of permitting the treaty-making department to supersede the legislative authority in all the cases enumerated in the 8th section.
